

THE BOOK WAS DRENCHED

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

OU_166172

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

OSMANIA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

Call No. 342.942/P488 Accession No. 5481

Author Dutailly, C. P.

Title Studies Supplementary to Stubbs.
Constitutional History

This book should be returned on or before the date last stamped on slip

PUBLICATIONS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER

HISTORICAL SERIES

No. XXIII.

Studies and Notes supplementary to Stubbs' Constitutional History

I and II

Published by the University of Manchester at
THE UNIVERSITY PRESS (H. M. McKECHNIE, Secretary)
12 Lime Grove, Oxford Road, Manchester

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.
London : 39 Paternoster Row
New York : 443-449 Fourth Avenue, and Thirtieth Street
Bombay : 8 Hornby Road
Calcutta : 303 Bowbazar Street
Madras : 167 Mount Road

[ALL RIGHTS RESERVED].

Studies and Notes
supplementary to Stubbs' Constitutional History

I and II

BY

CHARLES PETIT-DUTAILLIS

Honorary Professor in the University of Lille

Rector of the Academy of Grenoble

TRANSLATED BY

W. E. RHODES, M.A.,

Formerly Jones Fellow in History, and

W. T. WAUGH, M.A.

Assistant Lecturer in History

MANCHESTER

AT THE UNIVERSITY PRESS

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

LONDON, NEW YORK, BOMBAY, &c.

1915

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER PUBLICATIONS

NO. XCII.

The first part of these NOTES, pages 1 to 145, covering the first volume of STUBBS' CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, was issued separately in one volume in 1908, the second part, pages 147 to 316, covering volume II, in 1914.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Extracts from the Author's Preface - -	vii.
Preface to the English Translation to Part I.	xi.
Preface to the English Translation to Part II.	xv.
I. Evolution of the Rural Classes in England and the Origin of the Manor - - -	I
II. Folkland. Was there a public land among the Anglo-Saxons? - - - -	29
III. Twelfhynd-man and Twyhynd-man. A new theory of family solidarity among the Anglo-Saxons - - - - -	36
IV. The "Burh-geat-setl" - - - -	39
V. Dubbing to Knighthood. The reciprocal influences of the Anglo-Saxon and Frankish civilizations - - - -	42
VI. The Origin of the Exchequer - - -	45
VII. English Society in the Feudal Period. The tenurial system and the origin of tenure by military service - - - - -	52
VIII. The Origin of the Towns in England - -	67
IX. London in the 12th Century - - -	91
X. The Two Trials of John Lackland - -	107
XI. An "Unknown Charter of Liberties" -	116
XII. The Great Charter - - - - -	127

	PAGE
XIII. The Forest—
(1) The Forest and the Right of the Chase in Mediæval England — Organisation of the Forest - - - - - - -	149
(2) Origin of the Forest — Development of the System under the First three Norman Kings	166
(3) The Forest under the Angevins - - -	179
(4) The Charter of the Forest of 1217 - - -	187
(5) The Forest in the Thirteenth Century - -	199
(6) The Struggle for Disafforestation - - -	209
(7) Some Remarks on the Origin of the Purlieu -	233
(8) The Decline of the Forest—Contrary Develop- ment in France - - - - -	239
XIV. Causes and General Characteristics of the Rising of 1381 - - - - -	252
(1) Causes of the Rising - - -	255
2) General Characteristics and Results of the Rising	281
Index - - - - - -	305

EXTRACTS FROM THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

THE French edition of the "Constitutional History" of William Stubbs is intended for the use of the students of our Faculties of Arts and Law . . . The "Constitutional History" is a classic and the readers of the "Bibliothèque internationale de Droit public"¹ have seen it more than once quoted as a book the authority of which is accepted without discussion. It seems desirable, however, to emphasize the exceptional merits of this great work as well as to draw attention to its weak points and, as it is not an adaptation but a translation—complete and reverent—that is given here, to explain why we have thought some additions indispensable . . . All that we know of Stubbs inspires confidence, confidence in the solidity and extent of his knowledge, the honesty of his criticism, the sureness of his judgment, the depth of his practical experience of men and things. Despite the merit of his other works, and especially of the prefaces which he wrote for the Chronicles he edited, Stubbs only showed the full measure of his powers in the "Constitutional History." It is the fruit of prodigious labour, of a thorough investigation of the printed sources which a historian could consult at the period when these three bulky volumes successively appeared. It is an admirable storehouse of facts, well chosen, and set forth with scrupulous good faith. The word "Constitution" is taken in its widest sense. How the England of the Renaissance with its strong Monarchy, its House of Lords, its local institutions, its Church, its Nobility, its towns, its freeholders and its villeins was evolved from the old Anglo-Saxon Britain,

1. In which the translation is included.

this is the subject of the author's enquiry. With the exception of diplomatic and military history he touches upon the most diverse subjects. His book is at once a scientific manual of institutions and, at least from the Norman Conquest onwards, a continuous history of every reign. Mr. Maitland has called attention to the advantages of the plan which by combining narrative and analysis allows no detail of importance to escape, and gives a marvellously concrete impression of the development of the nation.²

Does this imply that the perusal of the "Constitutional History" leaves us nothing to desire? The French who have kept the "classical" spirit and reserve their full admiration for that which is perfectly clear, will doubtless find that his thought is very often obscure and his conclusions undecided. This is really one result of the vast erudition and the good faith of the author. This honest historian is so careful not to neglect any document, so impressed with the complexity of the phenomena that he does not always succeed in disposing them in an absolutely coherent synthesis

But inconsistencies of view and the relative obscurity of certain passages are not the only fault which impairs Stubbs' work. There is another, at once more serious and more easily remedied, a fault which is particularly felt in the first volume. The book is no longer up to date. The chapters dealing with the Anglo-Saxon period, especially, have become obsolete on many points. The revisions effected by Stubbs in the successive editions which he published down to his death, are insufficient. They do not always give an accurate idea of the progress made by research, and they are not even executed with all the attention to details which is desirable. Although the author had not ceased to be interested in history the task of revision obviously repelled him. The "Constitutional History" has grown out of date in yet another way. Stubbs wrote history on lines on which it is no longer written by the great mediævalists of to-day. He belonged to the liberal generation which had seen and assisted in the attainment of electoral reforms in England and of revolutionary and nationalist movements on the Continent. He had formed himself, in his youth, under the discipline of the patriotic German scholars who saw in the primitive German institutions the source of all human dignity and of all political independence. He thought he saw in the development of the English Constitution the magnificent and unique expansion of these first germs of self-government, and England was for him "the messenger of liberty to the world." The degree to which this optimistic and patriotic conception of English history could falsify, despite the author's scrupulous conscientiousness, his interpretation of the sources, is manifest in the pages which he devoted to the Great Charter. Nowadays when so many illusions have been dissipated, when parliamentary institutions, set up by almost every civilized nation, have more openly revealed, as they developed, their inevitable littlenesses and when the formation of nationalities has turned Europe into a camp, history is written with less enthusiasm. The motives of the deeds accomplished by our forefathers are scrutinized with cold impartiality, minute care is taken to grasp the precise significance which they had at the time when they were done, and lastly the economic conception of history exercises a certain influence even over those who do not admit its principles. Open the "History of English Law" of Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Maitland, the masterpiece of contemporary English learning, written twenty years after the "Constitutional History" and note the difference of tone.

2. Maitland, Eng. Hist. Rev., xvi., 1901, p. 422.

This French edition being intended for the use of students and persons little versed in mediæval history, it was necessary to let them know that the work is not always abreast of the progress of research and we have thought it possible to furnish them, although in a very modest measure, with the means of acquiring supplementary information . . .³

I have specially written for this publication a dozen studies and additional notes. Some of these lay claim to no originality, and their only purpose is to summarize celebrated controversies or to call attention to recent discoveries. In others a study of English history of some duration has allowed me to express a personal opinion on certain questions. The problems most discussed by the scholars who are now investigating the Anglo-Saxon, Norman, and Angevin periods have thus been restated with a bibliography which may be useful . . .

M. Bémont, the Frenchman who has the best knowledge of mediæval England, has been good enough to read the proofs of the additional studies.

CH. PETIT-DUTAILLIS.

3. M. Petit-Dutaillis proceeds to state that he has added to Stubbs' notes references to works and editions by French scholars "which he was unacquainted with, or at least treated as non-existent," and has referred the reader to better editions of English Chronicles and other sources where Stubbs was content to use inferior ones, or where critical editions have appeared since his death.

PREFACE TO THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF PART I.

THE twelve studies and notes here printed have been translated from the French of Professor Ch. Petit-Dutaillis in order to provide the English student with a supplement to the first volume of Bishop Stubbs' "Constitutional History of England."

The recent appearance of the first volume of a French translation of that classical work, more than thirty years after the publication of the corresponding volume of the original, is good evidence that it still remains the standard treatise on its subject. At the same time, the fact that M. Petit-Dutaillis, the editor of the French edition, has found it necessary to append over 130 closely printed pages by way of addition and correction shows that the early part of the book, at all events, has not escaped the ravages of time. The thirty years which have elapsed since it appeared have seen much fruitful research both in England and abroad upon the period which it covers. Continental scholars such as Fustel de Coulanges and Meitzen and in this country Maitland, Seeböhm, Round, Vinogradoff, and others have added greatly to our knowledge of the origin and early history of English institutions. The results of this research so far as it had proceeded in Stubbs' lifetime were very imperfectly incorporated by him in the successive editions of his book. Moreover, as M. Petit-Dutaillis points out in his preface, the study of these institutions is now approached from a standpoint different from that which was taken by Stubbs and his contemporaries. Some portions of the first volume of the "Constitutional History" have, therefore, become obsolete and others require correction and readjustment.

Teachers and students of English constitutional history have long been embarrassed by a text-book which, while indispensable as a whole, is in many points out of date. Hitherto they have had to go for newer light to a great variety of books and periodicals. English historians were apparently too much engrossed with detailed research to stop and sum up the advances that had been made. It has been left to a French scholar to supply the much-needed survey. M. Petit-Dutaillis, who was, at the time when he brought out the first volume of his edition, Professor of History in the University of Lille, but has quite recently been appointed Rector of the University of Grenoble, had already shown an intimate and scholarly acquaintance with certain periods of English history in his "Etude sur la vie et le règne de Louis VIII." and in his elaborate introduction to the work of his friend André Réville on the Peasants' Revolt of 1381. The twelve "additional studies and notes" in which he brings the first volume of the "Constitutional History" abreast of more recent research meet so obvious a need and, in their French dress, have been so warmly welcomed by English scholars, that it has been thought desirable to make them easily accessible to the many students of history who may not wish to purchase the rather expensive volume of the French edition in which they are included.

M. Petit-Dutaillis willingly acceded to the suggestion and has read the proofs of the translation. The extracts from his preface, given elsewhere, explain more fully than has been done above the reasons for and the nature of the revision of Stubbs' work which he has carried out.

As M. Petit-Dutaillis observes, in speaking of the French version of the "Constitutional History," the translation of books of this kind can only be competently executed by historians. It has in this case been entrusted to a graduate of the University of Manchester, Mr. W. E. Rhodes, who has himself done good historical work. I have carefully revised it, corrected, with the author's approval, one or two small slips in the French text, substituted for its references to the French translation of the "Constitutional History" direct references to the last edition (1903) of the first volume of the original, and added in square brackets a few references to Professor Vinogradoff's "English Society in the Eleventh Century," which appeared after the publication of the French edition. The index has been adapted by Mr. Rhodes from the one made by M. Lefebvre for that edition.

JAMES TAIT.

THE UNIVERSITY,
MANCHESTER,
September 8th, 1908.

PREFACE TO THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF PART II.

As was foreshadowed in M. Petit-Dutaillis' preface to the French translation of the first volume of the "Constitutional History" of bishop Stubbs, the second volume, of which the French version appeared last year, has been found to need much less revision of the kind for which footnotes are inadequate. Instead of the twelve additional Studies and Notes of volume I, which were translated by Mr. W. E. Rhodes and published under my editorship by the Manchester University Press in 1908, M. Petit-Dutaillis has thought it unnecessary to append to volume II more than two such studies. The subjects with which they deal, "The Forest" and "The Causes and General Characteristics of the Rising of 1381" are, however, treated with such thoroughness as to provide sufficient matter for another volume of "Supplementary Studies." In his preface M. Petit-Dutaillis holds out the hope that his additions to the third volume of Stubbs' work will be concerned with questions more directly constitutional; but the Forest played a part in the contest between the English crown and people which makes the inclusion of the first essay in these studies quite appropriate, while the many additions that have been made to our knowledge of the Peasants' Revolt since Stubbs wrote constitute a sufficient justification for the second. The translation of the two studies has been made by my friend and colleague Mr. W. T. Waugh, and my duties as editor have been exceedingly light. As in the first volume, a few footnotes have been added in square brackets, in most cases by Mr. Waugh, who has also adapted the index from the one made by M. Lefebvre for the French edition.

JAMES TAIT.

THE UNIVERSITY,
MANCHESTER,
July 10th, 1914.

I.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE RURAL CLASSES IN ENGLAND AND THE ORIGIN OF THE MANOR.

AT the end of the Middle Ages, rural England was divided into estates, which were known by the Norman name of manors.¹ The manor, a purely private division,² a unit in the eyes of its lord, did not necessarily coincide with the township or village, a legal division of the hundred and a unit in the eyes of the king; but, except in certain counties,³ the two areas were normally identical. In each of his manors, the lord of the manor retained some lands in demesne, which he cultivated with the aid of labour services, and he let the remainder in return for fixed dues, to the tenants, free or villein, who formed the village community.⁴ Agriculture and cattle-rearing

1. The term is not absolutely general. At the end of the 12th century it is not used in the Boldon Book, the land-book of the Bishop of Durham; the rural unit, in this document, is the villa, though in reality the manorial organisation existed. (Lapsley, in Victoria History of the Counties of England, Durham, i, 1905, pp. 262, 268.)

2. Maitland, Select Pleas in Manorial Courts, 1889, i, p. xxxix.

3. In the counties of Cambridge, Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, Lincoln, Nottingham and Derby, and in some parts of Yorkshire, the village was frequently divided between three or four Norman lords, at least at the date of Domesday Book (Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, 1897, pp. 22-23). The co-existence of several manors in the territory of one village sometimes brought about the partition of the village; or on the other hand it persisted, and was the cause of frequent disputes; see on this subject Vinogradoff, The Growth of the Manor, 1905, pp. 304 sqq.; Villainage in England, 1892, pp. 393 sqq.; Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 129 sqq.

4. See the description of the manorial organisation in Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, pp. 307 sqq., and Villainage, pp. 223 sqq. [Cf. also his English Society in the Eleventh Century, 1908, pp. 353 sqq.] Mr. Maitland has published an excellent monograph on the Manor of Wilburton in the English Historical Review, 1894, pp. 417 sqq. Numerous monographs of this kind would be very useful.

2 STUDIES IN CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

were carried on according to the system of the un-enclosed field, the open field.¹ In the manor The Open Field there were several fields alternatively left fallow or sown with different crops.² Each of these fields, instead of belonging as a whole to a single tenant, was divided, by means of balks of turf, into narrow strips of land, whose length represented the traditional length of furrow made by the plough before it was turned round. The normal holding of a peasant was made up of strips of arable land scattered in the different fields, customary rights in the common lands, and a part of the fodder produced by the meadows of the village. Once the harvest had been reaped in the fields and the hay got in in the meadows, the beasts were sent there for common pasture. Every one had to conform to the same rules, to the same method of rotation of crops; even the lord of the manor, who often had a part of his private demesne situated in the open field.

Whatever progress individualism had made in the 13th century, the inhabitant of a village was a member The Village Community. of a community whose rights and interests restricted his own, and which, in its relation to the lord of the manor, still remained powerful.³ Common business was discussed periodically in the hall of the manor, and the villeins, the English term for the serfs, attended the halimot just as much as the free tenants; although the villeins were in a majority, the free tenants were amenable to this court in which we see the peasants themselves "presenting" the members of the community who had done their work ill. The reason is that the community as a whole was answerable to its lord. Sometimes, moreover, the village, like the free towns, farmed the dues and paid a fixed lump sum to its lord. It was, then, a juridical person.¹ Finally, the village had its share in local government, police and the royal courts of justice.²

1. The English open-field system has been often studied. The starting point is Nasse's essay Zur Geschichte der mittelalterlichen Feldgemeinschaft in England, 1869. F. Seebohm revived the subject in his celebrated book, to which we shall have to refer again: The English Village Community, 1883, pp. 1 sqq. See ibid., pp. 2 and 4, the map and sketch made from nature—for there still exist some relics of these methods of cultivation. Cf. Mr. Vinogradoff's chapter on the Open-field System, in The Growth of the Manor, pp. 165 sqq.; Stubbs, i, pp. 52 sqq., 89 sqq.

2. For example: corn—barley or oats,—fallow.

3. See Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, pp. 318 sqq., 361 sqq. and passim; Villainage, pp. 354 sqq.

Thus the English manor, like a French rural domain of the same period, was dependent on a lord; and the lord claimed dues from his tenants and day-work to till the land which he cultivated himself. But the customs to which the exercise of the right of ownership had to defer, the methods of husbandry and pasturage, the importance of the interests of all kinds entrusted to the peasants themselves, showed the singular strength of the English rural community.

What was the origin of this manorial organization, of the usages of the open field, of the condition of the freeman and villeins, of this village community which had the rights of a juridical person and formed the primordial unit of local government?

The question of the origin of the seignorial and manorial system, which, in the history of the whole of the West, is a subject of controversy, is particularly obscure and complex in England, because England underwent only a partial Romanisation which is imperfectly known, and the exact extent and character of which it is impossible to estimate.

The "Romanists" and "Germanists" of the other side of the Channel engage in battles in which analogy and hypothesis are the principal weapons; and the projectiles are not mortal to either of the two armies.

The Germanists deny any importance in the develop-

1. We adopt on this point the views of Mr. Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, pp. 322 sqq.

2. Stubbs, Const. Hist., i, pp. 88 sqq., 102, 115, 128, etc.

4 STUDIES IN CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

ment of English institutions to the Roman element, as indeed also to the Celtic. The earliest of The Germanist thesis. them sought to explain the formation of the The Mark. rural community and even that of the manor by the Mark theory.¹ Several years before the appearance of the famous works of G. L. von Maurer on the Markverfassung in Deutschland, Kemble in his Saxons in England, drew a picture, somewhat vague in outline it is true, of a Saxon England divided into marks, inhabited by communities of free Saxons, associated of their own free will for the cultivation of the soil and exercising collective rights of ownership in the lands of their mark. In this "paradise of yeomen" the free husbandman is judged only in the court of the mark, submits to the customs of the mark alone, acknowledges no other head but the "first markman," hereditary or elected, or the powerful warrior who secures the safety of the mark. This head, however, ends, thanks to his prerogatives and usurpations, by reducing the members of the community to economic dependence. The lands not yet exploited, which should have remained as a reserve fund at the disposal of the people, fall into the hands of the chief men. This capital phenomenon fully explains the formation of the feudal and manorial system.²

Kemble had the merit of raising questions which are still debated at the present day; unfortunately, his The Mark theory has been partially abandoned. structure is a creation of fancy. Maurer, on the contrary, founded his Mark theory on a thorough study of the German village of the Middle Ages. But Fustel de Coulanges has accused him of having "attributed to ancient Germany

1. A summary of this controversy may be found in Vinogradoff, Villainage in England, pp. 16 sqq.; C. M. Andrews, Old English Manor (Baltimore, 1892) Introduction; E. A. Bryan, The Mark in Europe and America (Berlin, 1893), etc.

2. Kemble, Saxons in England, ed. W. de Gray Birch, 1876, vol. i, especially pp. 53 sqq., 176 sqq.

usages whose existence can only be verified twelve centuries later,"¹ and has partly succeeded in overthrowing the "mark-system." The Germanists can no longer maintain that the mark is "the original basis on which all Teutonic societies are founded,"² and even Stubbs, who appears to be unacquainted with the works of Fustel, and quotes those of Maurer with unqualified praise, makes some prudent reservations. He does not admit that the mark is a "fundamental constitutional element." But he thinks that the English village "represents the principle of the mark," and in the pages which he devotes to the township and the manor, he allows no place to Roman or Celtic influences.³ The majority of the best-known English historians of his generation and ours, Henry Sumner Maine, Freeman, Green, Maitland,⁴ are, like him, decided Germanists. In the same camp are ranged the German scholars who have studied or approached the problem of the origin of English civilization on any side, such as Konrad Maurer, Nasse, Gneist and Meitzen.

Until 1883, the Romanists had not given uneasiness to the English scholars of the Germanist school. The work of Coote⁵ was built in the air, on analogies and suppositions which were often extravagant; it is difficult to take seriously his theories on the fiscal survey of the whole of Britain, on the persistence of the Roman Comes and on the Roman origin of the shire. The book in which Fustel de

1. De la marche germanique in Recherches sur quelques problèmes d'histoire, 1885, p. 356. Cf. Le problème des origines de la propriété foncière, in Questions Historiques, ed. Jullian, 1893, p. 21 sqq.

2. Kemble, Saxons, p. 53.

3. Const. Hist., i, pp. 35 sqq., 52 sqq., 89 sqq., 97 sqq. For Stubbs' general views on the Germanic origin of English institutions, see ibid., pp. 2 sqq., 65, 68.

4. Mr. Maitland, however, entirely rejects the term 'mark' as applicable to the English village community. See Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 354-355.

5. The Romans of Britain, 1878.

6 STUDIES IN CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

Coulanges had studied Roman Gaul was little known on the other side of the Channel; nor would it have shaken the conviction of scholars who consider that English institutions have had an absolutely original development and are the "purest product of the primitive genius of the Germans." In 1883, the famous work of Mr. F. Seebohm appeared to disturb the tranquillity of the Germanists.

Mr. Seebohm set himself to examine "The English Village Community in its relations to the manorial and tribal systems and to the common or open field system of husbandry." Such was the title of the book; the problem to be solved was indicated in the preface thus: "whether the village communities of England were originally free and this liberty degenerated into serfdom, or whether they were at the dawn of history in serfdom under the authority of a lord, and the 'manor' already in existence."

The author proceeds from the known to the unknown; his starting point is a description of the remains of open field cultivation which he has himself observed in England. He has no difficulty in proving that this system was already employed at the end of the Middle Ages, and co-existed with the manorial organisation and villeinage. He then goes back to the period of the Norman Conquest. According to him, when the Normans arrived in England, they brought with them no new principle in the management of estates. Already, tempore regis Edwardi, we find the manor, with a lord's demesne and a village community composed of serfs, whom the lord has provided with indivisible holdings; the Domesday Book of the eastern counties speaks indeed of liberi homines and sochemanni, but they were Danes or Normans: the natives were not free tenants. Earlier still, in the time of King Ine or Ini, at the end of the seventh century, the usages of the open field existed, the ham and the tun were manors, the thegn or hlaford was the lord of a manor, the ceorl was a serf. And as in the laws of Ethelbert a century older, there is mention of hams or tuns belonging to private individuals or to the king, the manor must already have existed at the end of the sixth century. Now, the Anglo-Saxons, at that time, had scarcely completed the conquest of the island; it is impossible, therefore, that the free village community, conforming to the mark system, can have been introduced by them into England, since the first documents that we have on their social condition prove that this free community did not exist. Therefore either the Saxons brought the system of the manor and the servile community into England, or else they found it already established there, and made no

The manor
and villeinage of Roman
origin.

change in it. This second hypothesis is the more probable; the manorial and servile organisation must go back to the period of Roman domination in Britain. It will be objected that the Romans were few in number, that the Britons were Celts, and that, in the countries where Celtic civilization persisted, Wales and Ireland, the manorial organisation did not exist in the Middle Ages. The Celtic tribal community was entirely unacquainted with the fixed and indivisible holding which is one of the essential features of the manor. But, declares Mr. Seebohm, there is nothing to prove that before the arrival of the Anglo-Saxons the whole of Briton was still under the empire of the customs of pastoral and tribal civilization. The evidence of Cæsar proves that the inhabitants of the south-east had already passed out of this stage. The Romans found subjects accustomed to a settled life. They had no difficulty in establishing in their new province the régime of the 'villa,' the great estate, that is to say, the manor: and the administrative abuses of the Lower Empire hastened the formation of the seignorial authority and the enslavement of the free husbandmen, Germans for the most part, whom the emperors had imported in large numbers to colonise the country. The Romans, for the rest, improved agriculture and introduced the use of the triple rotation of crops; they thus gave to the open field system, which the Britons had only practised until then in its most rudimentary form, its definitive constitution.

8 STUDIES IN CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

As for the hypothesis according to which the open field system with triple rotation and lordship with servile, indivisible holdings, was introduced after the fall of the Roman domination, by the Anglo-Saxons, it is not indefensible, but only upon condition that the Anglo-Saxons came from Southern Germany, which had undergone contact with Roman civilization, and not, as is generally thought, from Northern Germany, where the triple rotation of crops was unknown. Mr. Seebohm does not reject this supposition, which, indeed, does not exclude the first hypothesis. Half Romanised Germans may have found in England the system of husbandry with which they were already acquainted on the Continent. In either case the English manor has a Roman origin.

Mr. Seebohm's work compels attention by the skill with which the author sets forth his ideas and puts fresh life into the subject. As we shall see, it has obliged the Germanists to make important concessions. But the theory, taken as a whole, is untenable. We are struck, in reading it, by the viciousness of his general method, by the missing links in his chain of proof, by the poverty of many of his arguments. The method of working back adopted by Mr. Seebohm is extremely fallacious; it falsifies the historical perspective, and the author is inevitably led to reason in most cases by analogy. By such a method, if some day the documents of modern history disappear bodily, a scholar might undertake to connect the trades unions of the nineteenth century with the Roman Collegia. "No amount of Objections.

The Roman origin is not proved.

analogy between two systems," says Stubbs wisely, "can by itself prove the actual derivation of one from the other." ¹

Mr. Seebohm juggles with texts and centuries very adroitly, but not by any means enough to create the illusion of continuity which he claims to see himself in going back through the course of the ages. There are yawning gaps in his demonstration.

The alleged proof drawn from the laws of Ethelbert amounts to nothing; the thesis of a Roman England entirely divided into great estates is an absurd improbability; the same is true of the supposition that the Saxon pirates could have come from the centre of Europe. Even when Mr. Seebohm treads on ground which appears more solid, and quotes his documents, he is unconvincing. In fact, from the time that he arrives, in his backward march, at Domesday Book, he loses hold on realities and allows himself to be duped by his fixed idea. He is the sport of a veritable historical mirage, when he sees the whole of England in the eleventh century, covered with manors like those of the thirteenth and cultivated by serfs. Still more misleading is the illusion by which England presents itself to him under the same aspect during the Anglo-Saxon period. According to him, the ceorl is a serf; he is the conquered native; the Saxon conquerors are the lords of manors, the successors of great Roman landowners. He takes no account of the texts which prove the freedom of the ceorl, and the existence of the small landholder; he does not explain at all what became of the mass of the German immigrants who had crossed the North Sea in sufficient numbers to impose their language on the Britons. His mistake is as huge as that of Boulainvilliers, who sought the origin of the French nobility and of feudalism in the supremacy of the Frank conquerors and the subjection of the Gallo-Romans.

1. Stubbs, op. cit. i, p. 227.

Mr. Seebohm's Romanist thesis, despite a brilliant success in the book market, has, in short, turned out but a spent shot. Among English historians of mark Mr. Ashley now stands alone, and with many reservations too, as its defender.¹ But it has had the merit of stimulating the critical spirit and of inducing the moderate Germanists, such as Green or Mr. Vinogradoff, to make concessions which we think justified.

There is, in fact, no necessity to range oneself in either camp, to be "Germanist" or "Romanist," to neglect completely, as Stubbs has set the regrettable example of doing, all facts anterior to the Germanic conquest, or to fall, like Coote or Mr. Seebohm, into the opposite extreme.

It is not reasonable to seek a single origin for English institutions, and to pretend to explain by one formula a very complex state of things, which was bound to vary not only in time, but also in space. The eclectic method adopted by Mr. Vinogradoff in his recent work on the "Origin of the Manor," appears to us a very judicious one, and we believe it alone to be capable of leading to the real solution.

To begin with, room must certainly be left for an original element which the uncompromising Germanists and Romanists alike have, by common consent, ruled out of the discussion: the Celtic element.²

1. The origin of Property in Land, by Fustel de Coulanges, translated by Margaret Ashley, with an introductory chapter on the English Manor, by W. J. Ashley, 1891; 2nd edition, 1892.—An introduction to English Economic History, vol. 1, 3rd edition, 1894, translated by P. Bondonio and corrected by the author, under the title of Hist. des doctrines économiques de l'Angleterre, 1900, vol. i, pp. 30 sqq.

2. We do not mean to say that England, before the arrival of the Romans and Germans, was peopled by Celts only. There were pre-Celtic populations, perhaps more important as regards numbers, but the Celtic civilization predominated. See a very interesting general sketch of the English races in H. J. Mackinder, Britain and the British Seas, 1902, pp. 179 sqq. A summary bibliography of works relative to the Prehistoric and Celtic periods will be found in Gross, Sources and Literature of English History, 1900, pp. 157 sqq.

We can get an approximate idea of its character and creative action,—on condition of being content with general conclusions,—by consulting the much later and indirect sources which we possess on Celtic tribal civilization: the Welsh laws especially, the Irish laws, and the information we have on the Scottish clan, or on the Celts of the Continent.¹

Whatever Mr. Seebohm may say, it is allowable to believe that the Britons, as Pytheas or even Cæsar knew them,² had not passed, from an economic point of view, the stage of tribal and still semi-pastoral civilization. Judging by the general history of the Celts and the data of comparative history, they knew nothing similar to the manor. The inferior class called taeogs dwelt apart, and did not work for the benefit of the free men. There was neither servile tenure nor even private property in the strict sense of the word. Their principal resource was cattle-rearing; Celtic agriculture was an extensive superficial agriculture, which required neither careful work, nor capital for the improvement of the soil. It was little fitted to inspire the feeling of individual proprietorship.

On the other hand the method of labour required the spirit of co-operation. The plough was large and heavy; eight oxen were usually yoked to it; it was so costly a thing that it could only belong to a group of persons, and it is for this reason that, according to the Welsh laws, the land was divided into parcels assigned to the members of each plough-association, one supplying the plough-share, others the oxen, others undertaking to plough and lead the team.³ An understanding between

Origin of the Open Field.

1. For all that follows, cf. Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, pp. 3 sqq.

2. For the fragments of the journal of Pytheas, preserved in various ancient authors, and for Cæsar's description, see J. Rhys, Celtic Britain, 2nd edition, 1884, pp. 5 sqq., 53 sqq.

3. Seebohm, English Village Community, pp. 122 sqq.

the workers being indispensable for ploughing, and individual effort being reduced to a minimum, the conception of private property could not be the same as with our peasantry. The assignation of shares by lot, and the frequent redistribution of these shares were quite

Idea of property. natural things. Finally, the great importance of sheep and cattle rearing, of hunting and fishing was very apt to preserve communist habits. Everything inclines us to believe that in England the English village community and the open field system have their roots in the Celtic tribal civilization.¹

This probability cannot be rejected unless it can be proved that the Britons were exterminated and their agricultural usages completely rooted out, either by the Romans or by the Anglo-Saxons; and that is a thing which is impossible of proof.

The Roman element. The Romans did not exterminate the Britons, and recent archaeological excavations appear to prove that the manner of living of the native lower classes, their way of constructing their villages and of burying their dead, remained quite unaffected by contact with Roman civilization.²

Many regions of Britain entirely escaped this contact, none underwent it very thoroughly. The emperors' chief care was to occupy Britain in a military sense, in order to protect Gaul, and its foggy climate attracted few immigrants.³

1. I do not claim, it must be understood, that primitively the open field was peculiar to the Celts. Mr. Vinogradoff is of opinion that the system originated in habits of husbandry common to all the peoples of the North (Growth of the Manor, p. 106, Note 58). Mr. Gomme likewise thinks that the village community existed among all the Aryan peoples (The Village Community, 1890). This goes to show that these institutions had not been brought into England by foreigners, within historical times.

2. See A. H. L. F. Pitt Rivers, Excavations in Cranborne Chase, 1887—1898.

3. These characteristics of the Roman occupation are very well brought out and explained by Green, Making of England, 5th edition, 1900, pp. 5 sqq. Mr. Haverfield somewhat exaggerates the Romanisation of

Still the Roman domination lasted for three and a half centuries on the other side of the Channel, and every year English archæologists bring to light some comfortable or luxurious villa, with pavements in mosaic, painted stucco, hypocausts and baths.¹

Evidently the Roman officials, like the English in India to-day, knew how to make themselves comfortable; they brought with them industries and arts which pleased the higher ranks of the Britons. And this at least must be retained out of the hazardous theories of Mr. Seebohm, that the estate organised on the Italian model, the great landowner living in a fine country house, having the part he had reserved for himself cultivated by slaves, and letting out the rest of his property to coloni, were by no means unknown in Britain. By the side of the free Britons grouped in communities, there was a landed aristocracy.

The disturbance caused by the German conquest, by the wholesale immigration of the Angles and Saxons was no doubt immense. Stubbs is justified in appealing to the philological argument; the fact that the Celtic and Latin languages disappeared before Anglo-Saxon is sufficient to prove how thoroughly England was Germanised. But Stubbs is mistaken in looking upon England at the arrival of the Germans as a tabula rasa. What he calls the 'Anglo-Saxon system' was not built up on ground that was levelled and bare. It was the interest of the conquerors

Britain in the Introductory Sketch of Roman Britain, printed at the beginning of the excellent studies which he has written for the Victoria History of the Counties of England; for instance, in the Victoria History of Hampshire, vol. 1, 1900. See also his Romanization of Roman Britain in the Proceedings of the British Academy, vol. ii (1905-6). Cf. on the Roman occupation; Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, pp. 37 sqq., and the chapter by Mr. Thomas Hodgkin, in vol. i of the Political History of England, edited by W. Hunt and R. L. Poole, 1906, pp. 52 sqq.

1. See Mr. Haverfield's studies: Victoria History of Hampshire, vol. i, 1900; Worcester, vol. i, 1901; Norfolk, vol. i, 1901; Northamptonshire, vol. i, 1902; Warwickshire, vol. i, 1904; Derbyshire, vol. i, 1905, etc.

14 STUDIES IN CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

to utilise the remains of Roman civilization. Nor is it by any means proved that where they settled they exterminated the native population.¹ They had no aversion to the usages of the open field, and could quickly accustom themselves to live side by side with the British peasants. The Celtic tribal communities would be absorbed in the village communities formed by the ceorls. At the same time, the very great inequality which prevailed among the Anglo-Saxons, the development of royal dynasties and ealdorman families richly endowed with land, and, lastly, the grants made to the Church, necessarily preserved the great estate, cultivated with the help of 'theows' or slaves and of coloni.

Nevertheless, for the establishment of the seignorial system in England it was not enough that there were rich men and 'theows.' The predominance of the small freehold, the existence of numerous 'ceorls' cultivating their hide² and members of independent communities, were incompatible with the general establishment of the manorial system. A new classification of Persistence of the earlier agrarian customs.

Tendencies towards a new classification of society.

1. J. Rhys, Celtic Britain, pp. 109-110. See also R. A. Smith in the Victoria History of Hampshire, vol. i, p. 376; he gives the bibliography of the question.

2. The hide has been the subject of numberless controversies. There is a whole literature on the question, and the subject is not exhausted, for the good reason that the term has several meanings, and the hide was not, as a matter of fact, a fixed measure. Stubbs states that the hide of the Norman period "was no doubt a hundred and twenty or a hundred acres" (Const. Hist., i, p. 79). But he should have drawn a distinction between the fiscal hide, which was a unit of taxation, and the real or field hide. Mr. Round (Feudal England, 1895, pp. 36 sqq.; see also Victoria History of Bedfordshire, 1904, vol. i, pp. 191-193) and Professor Maitland (Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 357 sqq.) have shown the artificial character of the Domesday hide. This hide was very generally divided into 120 fractions called acres [for fiscal hides of fewer acres see Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, p. 155], but these appellations did not correspond to any fixed reality, any more than did the "ploughland" (carrucata) and the "sulung" or the French "hearth" of the Middle Ages. The hide (or hiwisc, hiwship), in its other sense, the primitive one, which it continued to retain alongside its fiscal sense, denoted the quantity (obviously variable according to locality) of society had to come into existence; some freemen had to descend in the social scale, while others raised themselves. This transformation was inevitable in an age in which the old bonds of tribe and family no longer sufficed to give security to the individual, and in which the royal power was not yet able to ensure it. Throughout Christendom patronage and commendation, along with private appropriation of public powers, paved the way for a new political and social system.

The Anglo-Saxon kings, under the pressure of necessities which were not peculiar to them, at an early period bestowed on their thegns and on churches either lands or the rights which they possessed over some village and the community of freemen who dwelt there.

Gifts of land and royal rights to thegns and churches.

Thenceforward such thegns or churches levied on their own account the taxes, dues and supplies hitherto due to the king; for example, the profitable firma unius noctis. Armed with this right the recipient became the lord of the free village, the peasants commended themselves to him,¹ and the parcel of land or the house which he possessed in the neighbourhood became a centre of manorial organisation; the lands of the peasants who had commended themselves came ultimately to be considered as in some way held of him. The grant of judicial rights (sac and soc) was also a powerful instrument of subjection. When a church or thegn received a grant of soc and soc in a district the rights arable land and rights of common necessary for the maintenance of a family. The actual number of acres in the real hide was often 120, but not always. The hide is not therefore an agrarian measure; it is the unit of landed property, the terra familiae, and we must doubtless conclude that the hundred was an aggregation of a hundred of these hides. See Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, pp. 141, 151 sqq., 170, 250, Note 33. Stubbs says elsewhere (op. cit. p. 185) that "the hide is the provision of a family." He ought to have adhered to that definition.

Sac and Soc

1. On Anglo-Saxon commendation, see Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, p. 69; Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, vol. i, pp. 30, 31.

so conferred were exercised, either in the court of the hundred or in whatever popular court it pleased the grantee to set up; the reeve of the church or thegn presided over the court and received the fines. Stubbs ascribes the beginning of grants of sac and soc to the reign of Canute; but Mr. Maitland makes them go back to the seventh century.¹

The evolution which was carrying England towards the seignorial régime became a very much speedier

Results of the struggle against the Danes.

process in consequence of the struggles against the Danes in the ninth and tenth centuries. Professional soldiers, expensively armed, were alone capable of arresting this new wave of barbarians, and they necessarily became privileged persons. Military service was henceforth the obligation and attribute of thegns. Most of them had at least five hides, that is to say, landed property five times as large as the old normal family holding, and the revenue of their estates allowed them, with the serjeants whom they maintained (geneats, radknights, drengs) to devote themselves entirely to the profession of arms. A deeply defined division began to show itself

Military and landed aristocracy

between these thegns or twelfhynd-men and the simple ceorls or twyhynd-men,² who continued to till the land and lost their old warlike character, that is to say, their best title to the privileges of a freeman. There remained soldiers on the one hand and tillers of the soil on the other. Labour in the fields had been formerly the occupation of every freeman; it was henceforward a sign of inferiority. At the same time the old tradition of the inalienable family holding grew weaker, many of the ceorls no longer had the hide necessary for maintaining a household and the

1. Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 80 sqq., 226 sqq., 236 sqq., 258 sqq., 318 sqq.; Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, pp. 212 sqq.

2. On the meaning of the terms twelfhynd-men and twyhynd-men, see below, pp. 36 sqq.

virgate, the quarter of a hide¹ became the common type of small freehold. To escape calamity therefore men were obliged to abase themselves before some powerful neighbour. Little by little, for reasons at once economic and political, the bonds of dependence were drawn closer between the "liber pauper" and the thegn, rich, esteemed, endowed by the king with a portion of public authority, and become, as it were, his responsible representative in the district.² This formation of a military and landed aristocracy is a general phenomenon in the history of the West, which explains, in France as in England, the decay of the small freeholders and the definitive entrance of the seignorial system.

Domesday Book, drawn up twenty years after the Norman invasion, allows us to form some idea of the state of rural England at the end of the Anglo-Saxon period. It is a document bristling with difficulties, and of baffling obscurity. But, since the appearance of the 'Constitutional History,' it has been the subject of a number of admirable studies, some of which were known to Stubbs and might have been utilised more by him in the last editions of his work. Mr. Round has elucidated some particularly thorny questions in his Feudal England, and he and other scholars are at present furnishing the editors of the Victoria History of the Counties of England with a detailed examination, county by county, of all the historical information that Domesday Book contains. Mr. Maitland has drawn a masterly picture of Anglo-Saxon society in the eleventh century in his Domesday Book and Beyond, an at times daring but extremely suggestive synthesis, one of the finest books which

1. On the virgate, see Vinogradoff, Villainage, p. 239; J. Tait, Hides and virgates at Battle Abbey, in English Historical Review, xviii, 1903, pp. 705 sqq.

2. Maitland, Domesday Book, pp. 163 sqq.; Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, pp. 216 sqq.; A. G. Little, Gesiths and Thegns, in English Historical Review, iv, 1889, pp. 723 sqq.

English scholarship has produced. Finally Mr. Vinogradoff, in his Villainage in England and his quite recent Growth of the Manor [and English Society in the Eleventh Century], has put forth solutions which deserve the most favourable attention.

The very nature of the document, the end King William had in view in commanding this great inquest, are sufficiently mysterious to begin with. For Mr. Round and Mr. Maitland, Domesday is a fiscal document, a "Geld-Book" designed to facilitate an equitable imposition of the Danegeld. Mr. Vinogradoff reverts to an older and more comprehensive definition, and believes that the royal commissioners wished not only to prepare the way for the collection of the tax, but also to discriminate the ties which united the subjects of the king to one another, and to know, from one end of England to the other, from whom each piece of land was held; in this way alone the political and administrative responsibilities of the lords in their relation to the king could be fixed.¹ We now understand why England, as the commissioners describe it, seems to be already divided into manors. Mr. Seebohm allowed himself to be misled by this appearance.² In reality the agents of the king spoke of manors where there were none, where there was nothing but a piece of land with a barn, capable of becoming some day a centre of manorial organisation; for it was of importance for the schemes of the Norman monarchy that the seignorial system should be extended everywhere.

1. Growth of the Manor, pp. 292 sqq.

2. Mr. Maitland, on the contrary, puts into sharp relief the contrast which exists between the manor of Domesday Book and the manor of the 13th century. He concludes that the manor of Domesday is not the seignorial estate, but the place at which the geld is received (Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 119 sqq.). This theory is untenable. See J. Tait, in English Historical Review, xii, 1897, pp. 770—772; Round, ibidem, xv, 1900, pp. 293 sqq. Victoria History of Hampshire, i, 443, Victoria History of Bedfordshire, i, 210; Lapsley, Vict. Hist. of Durham, i, 260; Salzmann, Vict. Hist. of Sussex, i, 355; Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, pp. 300 sqq.

Moreover, the nomenclature used is a source of perplexity and mistakes; the compilers often use Norman terms; the names they choose sometimes change their meaning later, so much so that they have become subject of controversy amongst modern scholars.

The difficulty, then, of an exact interpretation of Domesday Book is great. And even when the necessary precautions have been taken, it is a peculiarly arduous task to elicit from the document a clear description of Anglo-Saxon society tempore regis Edwardi.

Stubbs shows well how extraordinary was its complexity, what variety the ties created by commendation and gifts of land presented, and how diverse the personal and territorial relations were. The small freehold still existed side by side with the great estate; the most populous region, the Danelaw,¹ was a country of free husbandmen, of village communities.² Not only were there lands which belonged neither to thegns nor to churches, but there were, in the England of Edward the Confessor, whole villages, and in large numbers, in which the fiscal and judicial rights of the king had not fallen into private hands, nor did such villages form part of the royal demesne properly so called.

But the free husbandmen were for all that involved in the ties of dependence, as, indeed, were their lords, for the thegns were themselves thegns of an ealdorman, or a church, or another thegn, or the queen, or the king.³

1. On the extent of the Danelaw or Danish district, see a note of Mr. Hodgkin, in the Political History of England, edited by R. L. Poole and W. Hunt, i, 1906, pp. 315—317 [and Chadwick, Anglo-Saxon Institutions, p. 198].

2. Mr. Maitland remarks on the need of guarding against the temptation that assails those who have read Domesday Book, to see great estates everywhere at the end of the Anglo-Saxon period (Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 64, 168 sqq.).

3. Maitland, Domesday Book, p. 162. Upon the lāen-lands granted by the Church to the thegns, see ibidem, pp. 301 sqq.

The same personal or territorial ties which attached the members of the military aristocracy to one another established infinitely varied relations between them and the rest of the free population. The liberi homines commendatione tantum could leave their lord when they wished, for they had not subjected their land to him, and they had the right to "recedere cum terra sua absque licentia domini sui."¹ Sometimes, on the other hand, the commendatio attached the land to the lord, and if the land was sold, it remained under the commendation of the same lord. In certain cases the land belongs to a soc, and he who buys it has to recognise the judicial rights of the lord. Finally, the freeman may hold a terra consuetudinaria and owe dues or agricultural services; such are the *sochemanni cum omni consuetudine*² in the eastern counties, whom the compilers of Domesday Book would have called villani in another part of England.³

This last expression has been the source of mistaken theories which Messrs. Maitland and Vinogradoff have fully succeeded in clearing out of the way. In the eyes of Mr. Seebohm especially all the villani of Domesday Book were villeins in the sense which the word acquired later on in England, that is, peasants subject to personal servitude.⁴ In reality, the term has no legal sense here; villanus is the translation of tunesman, man of the village; he is, according to Mr. Vinogradoff, a member of the village community, who possesses the normal share in the open field. He has the same wergild as the sochemannus

1. See the numerous passages quoted by Round, Feudal England, pp. 24 sqq.

2. Ibidem, pp. 31 sqq.

3. On the sokemen of Domesday Book, see Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 66, 104 sqq.; Vinogradoff, Manor, p. 341; [English Society, pp. 124, 431.]

4. English Village Community, pp. 89—104. In his Tribal Custom in Anglo-Saxon Law, 1902, p. 504, Mr Seebohm begs that this servitude may not be confounded with slavery.

and, like him, owes only agricultural services fixed by custom and very light; by the side of the land he holds from a lord he may have an independent holding. In a general way at least, the villein of Domesday is a free man, a descendant of the ceorl, the twyhynd-man.¹

This social state, further complicated by the persistence of slavery, was the natural product of very remote antecedents, the fruit of the development and friction of several superimposed races, the spontaneous and varied result of the necessities of daily life and local historic forces, in a country where the pressure of the central power was extremely feeble. Neither the adventurers who followed William the Bastard in order to obtain a fine 'guerdon,' nor the servants of the Norman monarchy were disposed to respect this composite and bizarre edifice on which so many centuries had left their mark. They left standing only what was useful to them or did not inconvenience them. The Norman Conquest, begun by brutal soldiers and completed by jurists of orderly and logical mind, was to have for its effect the systematizing of the social grouping and its simplification at the expense of the weakest.

In fact and in law, the most original features of Anglo-Saxon society disappeared. In fact, during the hard years which followed the landing of William the natives who were not massacred or expelled from their dwellings² had to

1. Maitland, op. cit. pp. 38 sqq.; Vinogradoff, Manor, pp. 339 sqq. Mr. Maitland remarks also, with reason, that the conception of personal liberty is extremely difficult to fix in this period and throughout the whole of the Middle Ages; cf. the remarks of Stubbs (Const. Hist., i, 83). See also Seebohm, Tribal Custom, p. 430.

2. Here is an example of the expulsion of a humble peasant: "Ricardus de Tonebrige tenet de hoc manerio unam virgatum cum silva unde abstulit rusticum qui ibi manebat" (Domesday, quoted by Maitland, op. cit. p. 61, note 5). The difficulty is to know if these cases, which cannot all have been mentioned in Domesday, were numerous. Stubbs has preferred to discuss this difficult question of the spoliation of the Anglo-Saxon proprietors, and the transfer of their lands to the companions of the Conqueror, only incidentally and without dwelling upon it. To what accept the conquerors' terms. The small freeholders were reduced to a subordinate condition. The lands they held without being accountable for them to anyone were given degree were the native English deprived of their estates? What were the new families which were established in England? At the time when Stubbs wrote his book, Domesday Book had perhaps not been studied enough for it to be possible to reply to questions like these. Stubbs speaks with great reserve while giving proof of his habitual perspicacity. Augustin Thierry believed in an expropriation en masse, without however basing his thesis on serious arguments. Reacting against this view, Freeman claimed that a large number of natives kept their lands; as is well known, he generally tries to reduce to a minimum the results of the Norman Conquest. Stubbs notes (vol. i, p. 281, note 2) the confiscation with which William punished the declared partisans of Harold, and quotes on that head the passage in the Dialogus de Scaccario (i, c. x; ed. Hughes, etc., p. 100); but he does not believe that the bulk of the small owners were dispossessed. "The actual amount of dispossession was greatest in the higher ranks; the smaller owners to a large extent remained in a mediatised position on their estates." Mr. Round, in the studies which the Victoria History is at present publishing, hesitates to formulate a very decided opinion on this difficult subject; but he rejects the view of Freeman more completely than does Stubbs: "So far as we can judge all but a few specially favoured individuals were deprived of the lands they had held, or at most were allowed to retain a fragment or were placed in subjection to a Norman lord. And even the exceptions, there is reason to believe, were further reduced after Domesday" (Victoria Hist. of Bedfordshire, i, 1904, pp. 206-207). He confesses elsewhere that "great obscurity still surrounds the process by which the English holders were dispossessed by the strangers. The magnates, no doubt, were dispossessed either at the opening of William's reign or, on various pretexts, in the course of it" (Vict. Hist. of Warwickshire, i, 1904, p. 282). Mr. Round, it is obvious, does not believe in an immediate and methodical dispossession, but he considers that the cases in which an Englishman was fortunate enough to escape the storm were rare. Certain natives, like Oda of Winchester, particularly favoured by the Conqueror, lost their old estates and received others in their place: "In this, no doubt, there was deep policy; for they would henceforth hold by his own grant alone, and would be led, moreover, to support his rule against the English holders they had dispossessed" (Vict. Hist. of Hampshire, i, 1900, pp. 427-428. See also Essex, i, 1903, pp. 354-355; Buckinghamshire, i, 1905, p. 217). Saving these not very numerous exceptions, the Conquest, in Mr. Round's opinion, was a great misfortune for all the English. Let us remark that it is necessary to distinguish between the counties, and that on the borders of the kingdom, dispossession was more difficult. Mr. W. Farrer (Victoria Hist. of Lancashire, i, 1906, 283) considers that, in the region which under Henry II became the county of Lancaster, the greater number of the manors were held in the 12th century by descendants of the old Anglo-Saxon owners. With regard to the families from the Continent who were endowed with lands in England, many new details and rectifications will be found in Mr. Round's articles. He rightly insists in the pages he devotes to Northamptonshire, that the conquerors were far from being all Normans; in Northamptonshire, there were many Flemings and Picards (Vict. History of Northamptonshire, i, 1902, pp. 289 sqq.).

to Norman lords, and they could only continue to cultivate them by submitting to an oppressive system of dues and services; the same heavy burdens, of course, pressed upon the estates formerly held in dependence on a thegn, where rents and services had still been light.¹

Domesday Book shows us a certain Ailric, who had a fine estate of four hides, now obliged to hold it at farm from a Norman lord, "graviter et miserabiliter;"² it speaks of free men forcibly incorporated in a manor, "ad perficiendum manerium,"³ of the creation of new dues and the augmentation of the old. The diminution in the number of the sochemanni in the first twenty years of William's reign is characteristic: in the county of Cambridge there are no more than 213 of them instead of 900; 700 have descended to an inferior social rank.⁴ In the county of Hertford the decadence of this class is equally striking.⁵ In short, small free ownership has received a mortal blow, and the anarchy of Stephen's reign will complete the founding of the seignorial or manorial system.⁶

In law, the legal theory of ownership changed. All land, outside the royal demesne, was held of some one, was a tenement, that is, the subject of a dependent tenure, and the principle of "no land without a lord" was introduced into England. In addition every tenure involved of ownership.

New theory
Tenure.

1. Upon the whole of this question and upon the arguments drawn from the later condition of the peasants of the Ancient Demesne of the Crown and of Kent, see Maitland, Domesday Book, pp. 60 sqq.; Vinogradoff, Villainage, pp. 89 sqq., 205 sqq.; Growth of the Manor, pp. 295 sqq., 316 sqq.

2. Passage quoted by Maitland, op. cit. p. 61, note 3.

3. Ibidem, pp. 127-128.

4. Ibidem, pp. 62, 63. On these statistics of Domesday, see Maitland, op. cit. p. 17; Round, Victoria History of Hampshire, i, p. 433.

5. Round, in Victoria History of Hertfordshire, i, 1902, pp. 265 sqq.

6. On the troubles of Stephen's reign, see Stubbs, Const. Hist., i, 353 sqq.; H. W. C. Davis, The Anarchy of Stephen's reign, in English Historical Review, xviii, 1903, pp. 630 sqq.; Vinogradoff, Villainage, pp. 218-219.

some service. The military class definitively constituted itself in England in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, based on the very simple rule that a fief carries with it service in the army. In the same way the peasants were all tenants owing dues and generally manual labour; the conditions of their tenure became the essential criterion of their social rank. The manifold distinctions which divide the rural population in the Anglo-Saxon period, and of which traces remain in Domesday Book, were effaced under the double pressure of the seignorial authority and the common law. Slavery, which was repugnant to the habits of the Normans, and was in no sort of harmony with the principles of manorial exploitation,¹ completely disappeared. In the thirteenth century there are on the land only freeholders, perhaps in small numbers,² and villeins. It is, above all, the burdens of tenure in villeinage which constitute villein status; and the legal presumption of villeinage; he is not free who performs for his lord a "servile work," such as manuring the land or cleaning the ditches.³

Two kinds of rural tenure

1. See Maitland, Domesday Book, pp. 35-36.

2. See the case of the manor of Wilburton in Mr. Maitland's monograph, English Historical Review, ix, 1894, p. 418.

3. It is true that, if we examine the legal and manorial records relative to villeinage, matters are not so simple. The lawyers considered the villein as in a state of personal servitude towards his lord. Servus, naticus, villanus, are the same thing. The villein belongs, body and chattels, to his lord, has not the right to leave him, must pay merchetum when he marries his daughter. The reason is that the villeins of the thirteenth century were not descended only from the ancient Anglo-Saxon ceorls, the villani of Domesday Book, free men whom the troubles of the times had compelled to enter into the manorial organisation, to accept an aggravation of dues and services; there were also many villeins descended from Anglo-Saxon slaves (thcows; serri of Domesday). The villein class of the English Middle Ages sprang from this fusion. The Norman lord treated the ceorls burdened with labour-services and the theows alike; the theows gained thereby, but the ceorls lost; by contact with the slaves who became their equals they contracted some of the marks of servitude which degraded their companions, and the dying institution of slavery did not disappear without leaving stains behind it. Nevertheless, in practice, this personal servitude to which the villeins and not the freeholders are subject has no great importance. The conditions of tenure are the important thing. And here is a striking

For the rest, we must not exaggerate the difference which, in the thirteenth century, separated the tenant in villeinage and the tenant in socage. Slight difference between these two kinds of tenure From the economic point of view, their burdens differ in quality and quantity, but they are very nearly equivalent. From the point of view of the defence of his rights the freeholder is protected by the royal courts, while the villein has generally no action against his lord; but, in fact, he is perfectly protected against arbitrary treatment by the custom of the manor. Finally, as we have seen, he forms part of the village community by the same title as the freeholder.¹

We have thus arrived again at the point from which we started. We have seen how the masters of English mediæval scholarship reply just now to the Conclusion questions we put to ourselves. Even if we put on one side those who claim to explain the problems of the manor, the open field, villeinage and the village community by a Romanist theory which certainly cannot be accepted, these historians are far from being in agreement on all points. Mr. Maitland is a Germanist after the manner of Stubbs; the internal development of Anglo-Saxon society seems to him to be the key to all these mysteries; he willingly recognises the effects of the great catastrophe of 1066; but, for him, the seignorial system already existed in England at the end of the proof: the free peasants who have succeeded in not allowing themselves to be assimilated to the serri, the freeholders, or tenants in socage, are considered free as long as they have a free holding, burdened only with light and occasional services; if they accept a villein tenement, they come to be considered as serfs, personally dependent on their lord, pay the merchetum and are even called villeins, like the others. They can lawfully leave their holding, but they do not avail themselves of this right of renouncing their means of existence; and thus the tenement in villeinage imposes the status of a villein on him who takes it up. On the whole question, see Vinogradoff, Villainage, pp. 43 sqq., 127 sqq.; Growth of the Manor, pp. 296 sqq., 343 sqq.; Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, 2nd edition, 1898, i, pp. 356 sqq.

1. Vinogradoff, Villainage, pp. 81 sqq., 308 sqq.

Saxon period, as well as feudalism. Mr. Round has not approached these great questions as a whole, and has only thrown light on certain aspects of them; without doubt he looks on them from an entirely different point of view to that of Mr. Maitland.¹

Finally, Mr. Vinogradoff refuses to begin the history of the English rural classes at the invasion of the Anglo-Saxon pirates. According to him, the village community and the customs of the open field had their roots in a distant antiquity, and maintained themselves without great change throughout all catastrophes, as very humble things, which do not inconvenience the conquerors and adapt themselves to their plans, can do. The pattern of the great manorial estate was set in England as early as the Roman period, but the 'manor' did not become general until very much later, as a result of the formation of a rich military aristocracy, which as early as the Anglo-Saxon period began to establish its economic and political dominance over the remainder of the freemen, and was replaced, after the Conquest of 1066, by the powerful Norman feudal baronage. With the triumph of the manorial system coincided perforce the disappearance of small free ownership and the appearance of villeinage.

This last solution is the one which we believe to conform most closely to the documents as a whole, to the data of general history, and to common sense. It is, nevertheless, only a provisional solution. It must be supported by more thorough and extensive study of documents, and it will be beyond all doubt rectified on more than one point. The question of the origin of the English village community particularly still remains very obscure. To resolve it, we must be better informed than we are about the Anglo-Saxon village. As Mr. Vinogradoff has remarked, its organisation was not changed by way of legislation, and the modest concerns discussed by the ceorls did not excite the curiosity of the historians of that day, so that neither the laws nor the chronicles, give us sufficient information on the rural community. It existed undoubtedly; it watched over the collective concerns; but in what degree was it organised? Have we any right to apply to the Anglo-Saxon township what we know of the township of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, as Mr. Vinogradoff has boldly done?¹ Mr. Maitland advises caution, and without doubt he is right. He remarks that the communal affairs that had to be transacted in a free village were very few in number and that many of these villages were very small.²

Doubts concerning the village community

1. See Feudal England, p. 262.

We do not know what influence the Norman Conquest had upon the development of the rural communities.

The Norman point of view Did it curtail their freedom, or, on the other hand, did the Norman lords think it profitable to their interests to organise the village more thoroughly. We must discuss the question afresh, as Mr. Round, we shall see, has done in the case of military tenure, placing ourselves at the Norman point of view. English historians would do well to give more serious attention to M. Leopold Delisle's book on the agricultural class in Normandy. It is well to remember that servitude disappeared very early on the Norman estates; that the communities of inhabitants "exercised most of the rights appertaining to the true communes," that in the twelfth century some of them had the services which their lord could demand of them legally recognised, and that as early as the time of William the Conqueror we see the peasants of Benouville acting in a body and giving their church to the nuns of the Trinity at Caen.³ It would be desirable,

1. Growth of the Manor, p. 185 sqq.

2. Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 20, 21, 148 sqq.

3. Delisle, Etude sur la condition de la classe agricole en Normandie, 1851, pp. 137 sqq.

also, to keep in mind that "the companions of William, in whom many people see nothing but the spoilers of the wealth of the Anglo-Saxons, in more than one way renewed the face of England. We must not forget that most of them were great agriculturists." ¹

1. Ibid, p. 251.

II.

FOLKLAND.

WAS THERE A "PUBLIC LAND" AMONG THE ANGLO-SAXONS?

FOLLOWING Allen,¹ and along with all the scholars who have dealt with this question after Allen,² up to but Mistake of Allen excluding Mr. Vinogradoff, Stubbs in the earlier editions of his book, gave to the Anglo-Saxon expression folk-land the meaning of "land of the people," ager publicus, and expounded a whole theory of this alleged institution. In 1893, Mr. Vinogradoff showed decisively that Allen was mistaken.³ To this conclusive refutation Mr. Maitland, in 1897, added new arguments; he adopted, reproduced and completed it in a chapter of his Domesday Book and Beyond.⁴

Stubbs was evidently acquainted with the works of these two great jurists, although he does not expressly Attitude of Stubbs quote them; in the last edition of his Constitutional History he alludes to the new explanation of the word folkland, given by "legal antiquaries,"⁵ and has even obviously altered some passages of his work, in which he spoke incidentally of

1. John Allen, Inquiry into the rise and progress of the royal prerogative in England, 1830; 2nd ed., 1849, pp. 125—153.

2. Kemble, Freeman, Thorpe, Lodge, Pollock, Gneist, Waitz, Sohm, Brunner, etc.

3. P. Vinogradoff, Folkland in English Historical Review, viii, 1893, pp. 1—17. Cf. Stubbs' somewhat ambiguous note (Const. Hist., i, p. 81). See also Vinogradoff, The Growth of the Manor, 1905, pp. 142—143 and 244—245.

4. Book-land and Folk-land, in Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 244—258.

5. Stubbs, i, p. 81, note 2.

folkland.¹ But his readers may ask themselves whether he accepts the opinion of Professors Vinogradoff and Maitland or no even as regards the meaning of the word. For, in several other passages, he lets the older interpretation of Allen² stand; elsewhere he tells us that "the change of learned opinion as to the meaning of folkland involves certain alterations in the terminology, but does not seem to militate against the idea of the public land;"³ and he maintains his theory on the Anglo-Saxon ager publicus, when in reality it is impossible to admit its existence, if we adopt the conclusions of Mr. Vinogradoff on the meaning of the word folkland, as we are bound to do. An extraordinary confusion results from this hesitation of Stubbs, which, in view of the great and legitimate authority of the Constitutional History, will contribute to uphold a view of whose erroneousousness there can be no doubt.⁴

It is important to warn readers of Stubbs that : (1) folkland does not mean public land; (2) that there was not in Anglo-Saxon England any "public land" distinct from the royal demesne.

The term folkland is to be found in three texts only; a law and two charters. According to a law of Edward the Elder (900—924?) it appears that all suits concerning landed property might be classed in two categories: suits regarding folkland, and suits regarding bookland.⁵ One of the

1. Compare especially the editions of 1891 and 1903 in §§ 54 (p. 144) and 75 (p. 209).

2. See in the edition of 1903, the unfortunate use of the word folkland on pages 100, 118, 131, 138 and above all on page 202. This use is in contradiction with the previous explanation of the term in note 2 on p. 81. It is evident that Stubbs would have substituted public land for folkland, if these passages had not escaped him in his revision.

3. Ibid., i, p. 83, note 2.

4. The old mistake about folkland is reproduced in Mr. Ballard's recent book, Domesday Boroughs, 1904, p. 124.

5. Edward I, 2, in Liebermann, Gesetze der Angelsachsen, I, pp. 140—141.

two charters is a charter of exchange, granted by King Ethelbert in 858; it is in Latin; in the text there is no mention of folkland, but a note in Anglo-Saxon on the back of the document indicates that the king has converted into folkland a piece of land which he has received in exchange for another.¹ The third document is the will of the ealdorman Alfred, a document from the last third of the ninth century; it deals with a piece of land which is folkland and which the ealdorman wished to pass on to his son (according to all appearances an illegitimate son). He recognises that his son cannot enter into possession of this land unless the king consents.²

In these three documents folkland is opposed, not to private property, but to bookland, that is to say, land held by charter. All sorts of difficulties begin to appear if we understand by folkland the "land of the people," and, as Mr. Vinogradoff has ingeniously shown, the scholars who have followed Allen's interpretation have made additions to it, in order to maintain it intact, by which it has been rendered, really, more and more unacceptable. These difficulties vanish and the three texts become as clear as possible if we return to the explanation of the word folkland proposed in the seventeenth century by Spelman. Folkland signifies not the land of the people, public land, but the land held by popular custom, by folk-right. Bookland is the land held under franchises formally expressed in a charter, a book: under the influence of the Church and in consequence of the laws enacted by the king and the witenagemot, this more recent kind of property escaped old usages, and he who held it might dispose of it at his will, whilst folkland, at least in principle, was inalienable. It becomes clear to us that the law of opposed to

"Folkland"
"bookland"

and signifies land held by custom

1. Kemble, Codex diplomaticus aevi Saxonici ii, pp. 64—66, No. 281.
2. Ibidem, p. 120, No. 317.

Edward the Elder classifies every kind of property under the two rubrics of land held by custom and land held by a charter,¹ that King Ethelbert is converting a newly-acquired estate into folkland, inalienable property; that the consent of the king is necessary for the transmission to a bastard of folkland, a family estate subject to customary restrictions.

Thus folkland does not mean "public land." Stubbs gives his adhesion to this view a little unwillingly, it would seem,² in the passages he has carefully revised and corrected. But he maintains that there existed, at least until the end of the period of the Heptarchy,³ a public land belonging to the people and distinct from the royal demesne. It was "the whole area, which was not at the original allotment assigned either to individuals or to communities. . . . It constituted the standing treasury of the country; no alienation of any part of it could be made without the consent of the national council. . . . Estates for life were created out of the public land . . . the beneficiary could express a

1. The classification of the law of Edward, which recognises only folkland and bookland, oththe on boclande oththe on folclande, would be incomplete and surprisingly erroneous, if folkland signified "land of the people." It would leave out of account family property transmitted hereditarily, as distinguished from holdings burdened with services; yet such property certainly existed then. It is doubtless this difficulty which has led certain defenders of Allen's thesis to suppose, without a shadow of proof, that the hereditary family estate had disappeared at an early date. There was another difficulty: this land, had existed in any case; was it not strange that no term denoting it specially was to be found in the Anglo-Saxon texts? This objection had already struck Kemble. As they did not realise that family landed property was called in Anglo-Saxon folkland, they sought for a name for it. Hence the terms ethel (invented by Kemble), yrfeland (invented by Pollock), to which Stubbs has made the mistake of giving currency. (See Const. Hist., p. 81, note 2; compare, however, p. 80, note 1, restriction of the word ethel.) These appellations are not and cannot be founded on the authorities, for the good reason that the word denoting this kind of property was folkland.

2. In note 3 of vol. i, p. 81, Stubbs appears to hesitate and speaks of the "much contested term folkland."

3. "The public land," Stubbs supposes, "was becoming virtually king's land from the moment the West-Saxon monarch became sole ruler of the English." (op. cit. p. 212, cf. p. 100.)

wish concerning their destination in his will, but an express act of the king and the witan was necessary to give legal force to such a disposition. . . . The tribute derived from what remained of the public land and the revenue of the royal demesne sufficed for the greater part of the expenses of the royal house, etc.”¹

On what authorities is this theory founded? Stubbs, usually so precise, does not quote his authorities in his notes, speaks vaguely of “charters.” It is easy to see that, whilst appearing to accept the interpretation of the word folkland which Mr. Vinogradoff rediscovered in Spelman, Stubbs retains a historical theory founded principally on the three texts of which we have just been speaking and on the erroneous explanation of the word folkland. His expression, quoted above, respecting the possessor of an estate in public land, who expresses a desire in his will with regard to the destination of that estate, is founded solely on the will of ealdorman Alfred;² now, as we have seen, Alfred expresses a wish relative to his folkland, which as a matter of fact is a family estate, and not a portion of ager publicus.

It has been claimed, it is true, that other documents in which the term folkland is not used, attest the existence of an Anglo-Saxon ager publicus. Mr. Letter from Bede to Egbert Vinogradoff has clearly shown how unjustifiable such an interpretation is. The most celebrated of these documents is a letter of Bede to Egbert: the pseudo-monasteries of his time had caused so many estates, tot loca, to be given to them, that there did not remain enough to endow the sons of the nobles and warriors, ut omnino desit locus ubi filii nobilium aut emeritorum militum possessionem accipere possint. Stubbs concludes from this that “the sons of the nobles and the warriors who had earned their rest looked for at least a life estate out of the public land.¹ Who can fail to see that this translation of the words loca, locus, has arisen from a preconceived idea? It is perfectly allowable to suppose that the grants of which Bede speaks were made from the royal demesne. In England, as in France, men complained of the alienations from the royal demesne, or at least of the manner in which they were effected. That is all that Bede's letter proves.

1. See especially Const. Hist., i, pp. 82-83, 202-203, 212. See also pp. 118, 127, note 4, 131, 138, 159, 302, etc.

2. It may be noted too that, in the document, there is mention of the consent of the king, but the witan are not referred to.

It was doubtless with a view to restraining the imprudence of which Bede speaks that in the following century the witan intervened in matters of alienation of the demesne. The consent of the Witenagemot to alienations of land is an incontestable and interesting fact, but it has not the significance Stubbs attributes to it. We must begin by remarking with Mr. Maitland that this consent is at first very seldom expressed,—four times only in charters anterior to 750; it becomes habitual in the ninth century, then falls in desuetude, and from about 900 or 925 onwards is replaced by the mere mention of the confirmation by witnesses.² Again, there is no reason to attach a very special importance to the intervention of the witan in cases of alienation, since they dealt with all kinds of business; their very extensive political rôle is one of the characteristic features of Anglo-Saxon institutions. Finally, the mention we have of the consent of the witan in no wise confers more probability on the theory that there existed a public land distinct from the royal demesne. In the often quoted charter of 858 the land which Ethelbert alienates with the consent of his witan is called terra juris mei. We have no document in which the land alienation of which the witan confirm or revoke appears as a part of the ager publicus.

1. op. cit. p. 171. The passage in Bede [ed. Plummer, i, 415] is quoted in note (2).

2. Cf. Stubbs, Const. Hist., i, p. 212.

Thus there is no ground for distinguishing between public land and royal demesne. The Anglo-Saxon kings had evidently in that respect ideas as vague and blurred in outline as our Merovingians, and it would be very singular if they had established a distinction between two things so difficult not to confound.

Stubbs' theory about Anglo-Saxon public land is therefore a weak part of his work. He was often enough unfortunate when he founded general theories on the work of others. But he was a scholar of incomparable perspicacity and sobriety when he studied the sources himself; this was most frequently the case, and it is for that reason that his book maintains its position.

III.

TWELFHYND-MAN AND TWYHYND-MAN.

A NEW THEORY RESPECTING FAMILY SOLIDARITY AMONG THE ANGLO-SAXONS.

ACCORDING to the usual interpretation which has been adopted by Stubbs,¹ the twelfhynd-man is the man who Usual interpretation has a wergild of 1,200 shillings, and the twyhynd-man is the simple ceorl, who has a wergild of one-sixth of that amount. Similarly the oath of the twelfhynd-man, in a court of justice, is worth six times that of the ceorl. The intermediate class of sixhynd-men possessed a wergild of 600 shillings. Hynd, hynden is hund, a hundred. Twelfhynd-man ought to be translated man of twelve hundreds, twyhynd-man by man of two hundreds, etc.

In a fairly recent book, which is moreover a work of absorbing interest, Mr. F. Seebohm proposes an entirely different explanation, which serves him Interpretation of Mr. Seebohm as the foundation of his theory as to the importance of family solidarity in the formation of Anglo-Saxon society.² According to him the term hynden, which we find in the 54th chapter of the laws of King Ine or Ine, has no numerical significance, and denotes the compurgators who support with their oath a kinsman accused of murder. The judicial oath of full value, which can aid a man most effectively to purge himself of an accusation, is the oath taken by the twelve oath-helpers of his kindred, having each a complete family. In primitive times a great number of relatives is an unquestionable advantage.

1. Const. Hist., i, pp. 128, note 4, 175, 178.

2. Tribal Custom in Anglo-Saxon law, 1902, pp. 406 sqq., 499 sqq.

The kindred aids the accused with the weight of its oath, or else by fighting for him when private war is inevitable, or else again by paying a share of his wergild. The twelfhynd-man, then, is the man in possession of a full kindred, which assures him the maximum of credit in the court of justice, and enables him to produce "twelve hyndens," that is to say, twelve kinsmen representing twelve groups ready to defend him. The twyhynd-man is the man who does not enjoy this advantage; he can only produce two oath-helpers, or at least those whom he produces are worth only "two hyndens," carry only one-sixth of the weight of the oath-helpers of the twelfhynd-man. Whether he be, by origin, an emancipated slave or a free man of low condition, or a native belonging to the conquered race, or an immigrant foreigner, he is in every case a man who has not a family sufficiently numerous to protect him when he is accused. The result for him is that he is obliged to seek the protection of a magnate, an act fraught with great consequences; the twyhynd-men thus form the class of tenants dependent on a lord, who at critical times takes the place, for his men, of the powerful kindred, which is at once the pride and the support of the twelfhynd-man.

The unfortunate thing is that Mr. Seebohm offers no convincing reasons for the new translation which he gives of the hynden of Ini. There is no Objections reason for rejecting in this passage its ordinary meaning: hund, a hundred.¹ Moreover, we

1. Chapter 54 of Ini (see Liebermann, Gesetze i, pp. 112—115) is, moreover, very obscure. Mr. Chadwick in his Studies on Anglo-Saxon Institutions (1905), pp. 134—151 has minutely studied the question of the value of the oath expressed in hides. A relatively satisfactory interpretation of chapter 54 can be deduced from his laborious researches, an interpretation which very nearly agrees with the translation proposed by Liebermann in his edition. The first clause of the chapter would signify: when a man is accused of murder and wishes to purge himself of the accusation by oath, it is necessary that for each hundred shillings (which the composition he is threatened with having to pay comprises) an oath should intervene "of the value of thirty hides." This oath of the value of thirty hides is that of the twelfhynd-man; it is worth six times that have an authentic document on the scale of wergilds: twelfhynd-man and twyhynd-man are explained in it in the clearest manner; hynd and hund are brought together in a manner which leaves no room for doubt.¹

The traditional opinion implicitly accepted by Stubbs, and adopted also in the most recent works² ought then to be retained.³ This remark does not, however, at all diminish the importance which Mr. Seeböhm so justly attaches to the social results of family solidarity. The participation of the kindred in the burdens and profits of the wergild is a fact of considerable significance in the history of law and manners, and the very terms whose meaning we have just been discussing sufficiently prove what a large share the wergild with all its consequences, had in the formation of the Germanic communities.

of the twyhynd-man or simple ceorl. For example, if the composition to be paid is 200 shillings, an oath proffered by two twelfhynd-men is necessary. But Mr. Chadwick has not succeeded in explaining the origin of the expression "oath of thirty hides." Mr. Seeböhm, op. cit. pp. 379 sqq., quotes and comments on a passage from the Dialogue of archbishop Egbert, in which the hides are replaced by tributarii: a priest swears "secundum numerum cxx tributariorum." Mr. Seeböhm concludes from this that the hide of the laws of Ini is "the fiscal unit, paying gafol, which is designated by the familia of Bede." Mr. Hodgkin (in the Political History of England, edited by W. Hunt and R. L. Poole, i, 1906, p. 230) remarks that usually the ceorl did not possess five hides, and that the thegns were far from all having the immense estates which the different documents relative to the oaths seem to presuppose. According to him, the figures of hides given in these documents were entirely conventional. On the meaning of hyndena and hynden-man, cf. Athelstan, vi, 3, in Liebermann, Gesetze, i, p. 175.

1. "Twelfhyndes mannes wer is twelf hund scyllinga. Twyhyndes mannes wer is twa hund scill" (Liebermann, Gesetze, i, p. 392). That is to say the wergild of a twelve-hundred-man is twelve hundred shillings, the wergild of a two-hundred-man is two hundred shillings.

2. Besides Chadwick, op. cit., see P. Vinogradoff, The Growth of the Manor, p. 125.

3. "The sixhynd-man," says Stubbs (Const. Hist., i, p. 179, note 3) "is a difficulty." Mr. Chadwick (op. cit., pp. 87 sqq.) proposes a fairly satisfactory solution. The sixhynd-man would be sometimes a gesithcund who can ride on horseback in the service of the king, without, however, possessing the five hides necessary to be a twelfhynd-man,—sometimes again a landowner having five hides, but of Welsh origin, and "worth" in consequence only one half an English owner of five hides. This class of sixhynd-men was doubtless hereditary and did not increase either from above or below, since, at the end of the Anglo-Saxon period, there is no longer any mention of it, and we must suppose it to have disappeared. Cf. Seeböhm, op. cit., pp. 396 sqq.

IV.

THE "BURH-GEAT-SETL."

STUBBS understands by the expression burh-geat-setl a right of jurisdiction without giving any further explanation.¹ It has been shown recently

The reading is incorrect that the text to which he refers, the little treatise which he alludes to, following Thorpe, under the name of Ranks, and which is entitled in the Quadripartitus: "De veteri consuetudine promotionum," has been badly read. There should be a comma after burh-geat and setl should be taken with the words on cynges healle which come after.² It is thus that the phrase was understood in the old Latin translations. The compiler of the Quadripartitus says: "Et si villanus excrevisset, ut haberet plenarie quinque hidas terre sue proprie, ecclesiam et coquinam, timpanarium et januam, sedem et sundernotam in aula regis, deinceps erat taini lege dignus." The compiler of the Instituta Cnuti also writes: ". . . et ecclesiam propriam et clocarium et coquinam et portam, sedem et privatum profectum in aula regis, etc." It is true that these Latin translations have not an indisputable

1. Const. Hist. i, pp. 86, 120, 210. H. Sweet, Dictionary of Anglo-Saxon (1897) says more explicitly: "~~Law-court held at city gate.~~" Similarly Bosworth-Toller, Anglo-Saxon Dictionary: "a town gate-seat, where a court was held for trying causes of family and tenants, ad urbis portam sedes." As a matter of fact there is certainly no question of a tribunal held at the gates of a town. Mr. Maitland in Domesday Book and Beyond (p. 190; cf. p. 196, note 1) made a different mistake, and translated burh-geat-setl by "a house in the gate or street of the burh." 'Geat' cannot signify street. Mr. Maitland has given up this translation. See below.

2. The passage is as follows: "And gif ceorl getheah, thaet he haeft fullice fif hida agenes landes, cirican and kycenan, bellhus and burhgeat, setl and sundernote on cynges healle. . . ." (Liebermann, Gesetze, i, pp. 456-457.)

authority. But Mr. Liebermann and before him Mr. W. H. Stevenson¹ have pointed out that the palæographic mark of punctuation by which the word geat is followed (a full stop having the value of a comma), and the rhythm of the whole passage, equally forbid us to take setl with burh-geat.

Setl, a very vague word, denotes in a general way a place; geat is the gate, and burh a fortified place, town, or house. The passage signifies therefore that, among the conditions necessary before a ceorl could become a thegn, he must have an assigned place and a special office (sundernote) in the hall, the court of the king, and also a belfry (bell-hus) and a "burh-gate." What does this "burh-gate" mean? Mr. W. H. Stevenson, the learned editor of the Crawford Charters and of the Annales of Asser, sees in it nothing but a rhetorical figure: the part is taken for the whole, and the "burh-gate" means simply the "burh," the fortified house. All idea of jurisdiction ought therefore to be laid aside. Stubbs and the other scholars who have made use of the passage not only, in Mr. Stevenson's opinion, retained an undoubted misreading but interpreted the expression badly. Mr. Maitland has rejected this last conclusion.² Mr. Stevenson's article having been published in the most widely-circulated English historical review, and Mr. Maitland's refutation having possibly escaped the notice of many readers, it seemed necessary to note here that on the whole Stubbs was not mistaken as regards the meaning of "burh-geat. Mr. Maitland points out, in fact, the following clause in a charter granted to Robert Fitz-Harding:³ "Cum tol et them et zoch et sache et belle et burgiet et infankenethef." The words

1. W. H. Stevenson, 'Burh-geat-setl,' in English Historical Review, xii, 1897, pp. 489 sqq.

2. Township and Borough, 1898, Appendix, pp. 209-210.

3. Printed in John Smyth, Lives of the Berkeleys, i, p. 22 (quoted by Maitland).

which surround “burgiet” here prove that there is question of an “outward and visible sign of jurisdiction or lordly power.” The gate of the burh had become, like the belfry, a symbol of the right of justice. But for what reason? Miss Mary Bateson has quite recently completed and simplified the explanation.¹ She shows that the seignorial court was often held near to the gate of the castle and to the belfry, and that a natural relation thus established itself between the gate, the belfry and jurisdictional power.

1. Borough Customs, ii, 1906, p. xvi, note 1.

V.

THE CEREMONY OF "DUBBING TO KNIGHTHOOD."THE RECIPROCAL INFLUENCES OF THE ANGLO-SAXON AND FRANKISH CIVILIZATIONS.

STUBBS believes rightly that the practice of "dubbing to knighthood" was derived from a primitive and very widespread custom, and allows that an analogous usage may have existed among the Anglo-Saxons; but he is inclined to believe that they borrowed it from the Franks.¹ Recently the converse hypothesis has been put forth.

M. Guilhaumez, in his fine Essai sur l'origine de la Noblesse, studies the history of dubbing.² He notices that the Germanic custom of the delivery of arms to the young man come to adult age, a custom described in the famous 13th chapter of the De Moribus Germanorum, is still to be distinguished, among the Ostrogoths, at the beginning of the sixth century; but afterwards it seems to disappear. Until the end of the eighth century the documents only speak of another ceremony, equally marking the majority of the young man, the barbatoria, the first cutting of the beard. From the end of the eighth century onwards, the ceremony of investiture reappears in the documents, while the barbatoria seems to fall into desuetude. Two explanations are possible; either the investiture took place, from the sixth to the eighth century, at the same time as the barbatoria, though it is not mentioned in the sources; that is the hypothesis which M. Guilhiermoz regards as most probable; or, on the other hand, "we might perhaps suppose that the solemn arming had disappeared among the Franks and that it only came into vogue again with them to replace the barbatoria as a practice borrowed from a Germanic people who had preserved it better . . . A passage in the life of St. Wilfrid of York, by Eddi, seems to allude to the custom of arming among the Anglo-Saxons at the end of the seventh century."¹

1. Const. Hist., i, pp. 396-397, and note 1, p. 396.

2. Essai sur l'origine de la Noblesse en France au Moyen Age (1902), pp. 393 sqq.; see particularly p. 411, note 60.

Thus the Anglo-Saxons, who kept many Germanic institutions which the Franks had dropped, are supposed to have preserved the primitive usage described by Tacitus and to have transmitted it, towards the end of the eighth century, to Charlemagne and his subjects. The hypothesis is an interesting one, and connects itself with a class of considerations which Stubbs perhaps did wrong to neglect. As M. Guilhiermoz says, "a certain number of facts show the influence exercised in the Frank empire by Anglo-Saxon usages in the seventh and eighth centuries." The anointing of the kings in France, Brunner has noticed, was an Anglo-Saxon importation; so also was the custom of entrusting the young people brought up at the palace to the care of the queen.²

The part that the scholars of the school of York played in the Carolingian Renaissance is well known. Carolingian painting, whose origins are complex and obscure, is beyond a doubt derived, in large part, from the early Anglo-Saxon art of miniature; and when we

1. "Principes quoque saeculares viri nobiles, filios suos ad erudiendum sibi (to St. Wilfrid) dederunt, ut aut Deo servirent, si eligerent, aut adultos, si maluissent, regi armatos commendaret." M. Guilhiermoz takes this passage from Raine, Historians of the Church of York, i, p. 32.

2. Guilhiermoz, loc. cit. and pp. 92, 93.

compare the strange and striking productions of English painting in the tenth century with those of the Rheims school in the ninth, we may ask ourselves whether, far from having inspired Anglo-Saxon art a century after, the famous psalter of Hautvillers, or "Utrecht psalter," was not painted in France by Englishmen.

Stubbs has shown forcibly the influence of Carolingian institutions on English institutions.¹ It would be well, perhaps, to insist equally on the expansion of Anglo-Saxon civilization, which is in certain respects remarkable.

1. An influence which was only however very powerful in the 12th century. Stubbs describes this phenomenon of tardy imitation, with much learning, in his account of the reforms of Henry II (Const. Hist. 1, 656—7).

VI.

THE ORIGIN OF THE EXCHEQUER.

SEVERAL scholars, since Stubbs, have examined the perhaps insoluble question of the origin of the Exchequer, notably Mr. Round and quite recently Messrs. Hughes, Crump and Johnson.¹ These latter come to the conclusion that the financial organisation described in the celebrated treatise of Richard Fitz-Neal proceeded both from Anglo-Saxon and from Norman institutions. We should have in it therefore a typical example of that process of combination which formed the strength of the Norman monarchy, and which Stubbs has put in so clear a light. But in the searching study which he made of the Exchequer Stubbs refrained from distinguishing the elements of this institution with a precision that the sources did not appear to him to justify. Are there grounds for speaking with more assurance than he did? Let us see what we have learnt for certain which he has not told us.

The Exchequer, it will be remembered, comprised two Chambers, the Inferius Scaccarium, a Treasury, to which the sheriffs came to pay the firma comitatus and other revenues of the king, and the Superius Scaccarium, a Court of Accounts staffed by the great officers of the crown and personages having the confidence of the king, whose business it was to verify the accounts of the sheriffs on the "exchequer," and also to give judgment in certain suits. The thesis of Messrs. Hughes, Crump and Johnson is that the Treasury, the firma comitatus and the system of payment employed in the first years after the Conquest, were of Anglo-Saxon origin, while the verification on the exchequer and the constitution of the staff of the Court of Accounts were of Norman origin. In short, an upper chamber of foreign origin was superimposed on a lower chamber already established before the Norman invasion.¹

1. In the introduction which they have prefixed to their critical edition of the Dialogus de Scaccario (1902), pp. 13—42.

The Anglo-Saxon kings could not do without a Treasury. Stubbs admitted the existence of a "central department of finance" before the Conquest,² and the latest editors of the Anglo-Saxon elements of the Exchequer Dialogus will meet with no contradiction on that head. Let us add that we know even the name of the treasurer of Edward the Confessor. An inquest relative to the rights of the king over Winchester, made between 1103 and 1115, speaks of "Henricus, thesaurarius," who, in the time of Edward the Confessor, had a house in that town, at which the Norman kings themselves for a long time kept their treasure.³ Two offices mentioned in the Dialogus, those of weigher (miles argentarius) and melter (fusor), appear to be anterior in origin to the constitution of the Exchequer properly so called, and evidently date, like that of the treasurer, from the Anglo-Saxon period.⁴ Stubbs himself tells us that the farm paid by the sheriffs was tested by fire and weighed, and that this operation could not have a Norman origin. Thus the offices of treasurer, weigher, and melter, the firma comitatus and the method of verifying the value of the money date from the pre-Norman period. Mr. Round has pointed out

1. Hughes, Crump and Johnson, op. cit., pp. 14, 28.

2. Const. Hist., i, p. 408, note 1.

3. Round, The officers of Edward the Confessor, in English Histor. Review, 1904, p. 92. Upon this inquest, see an article by the same author, in the Victoria History of the Counties of England, Hampshire, i, pp. 527 sqq.

4. In the time of Henry II., they were dependent on no other officer, and the author of the Dialogus was not sure whether he ought to connect them with the Lower Exchequer or the Upper Exchequer (Dialogus, i, 3; ed. Hughes, etc., p. 62). [Modern writers following Madox generally call the weigher pesour.]

that, contrary to an erroneous assertion of Stubbs, the "blanch-farm" is mentioned several times in Domesday Book.¹ Stubbs' proof might have been more complete and more exact, but on the whole his conclusion remains inexpugnable. No one is entitled to say, with Gneist and Brunner, that "the court of Exchequer was brought bodily over from Normandy." The pre-Norman origin of a part of the financial organisation of the twelfth century is a settled point.

Shall we now try to distinguish, with Messrs. Hughes, Crump and Johnson, the elements imported from abroad? "The arithmetic of the Exchequer, like the main portion of the staff of the Upper Exchequer, is," they say, "clearly of foreign origin."² The 'clearness' they give us on that point is not dazzling. Let us see what it amounts to.

The "exchequer" was a cloth divided into squares by lines, with seven columns, each column including several squares; according to the place it occupied at one or the other extremity a counter might signify one penny or 10,000 pounds.³ This arrangement suggested the idea of a game played between the treasurer and the sheriff,⁴ and, according to Mr. Round, was intended to strike the eyes of the ignorant and to make the business easy to such unskilful accounters as were the sheriffs of the time of Henry I. It was out of the question to demand writings on parchment from them.⁵

The editors of the Dialogus think, on the contrary, that the system required "skilled calculators," and suppose

1. The Origin of the Exchequer, in: The Commune of London and other Studies, p. 66.

2. Op. cit., p. 43.

3. See the description, op. cit., pp. 38 sqq.

4. "Inter duos principaliter conflictus est et pugna committitur, thesaurarium scilicet et vicecomitem qui assidet ad compotum, residentibus aliis tanquam iudicibus ut videant et judicent." (Dialogus, i, 3; p. 61 of edition quoted.)

5. Commune of London, p. 75.

that the Anglo-Saxons were ignorant of it. Personally we share the opinion expressed by Mr. Round, and we find a difficulty in admitting that the English were not acquainted with the use of the abacus before the Norman Conquest. But let us approach the problem more directly. Can we determine the provenance of the arithmetical system described in the Dialogus? Stubbs notices that the term Scaccarium comes into use only in the reign of Henry I.,¹ and that until then the financial administration is called Thesaurus or Fiscus. Mr. Round quotes² a curious passage from the Cartulary of Abingdon, which records a lawsuit tried in the Curia Regis at Winchester, in the Treasury: "apud Wintoniam, in Thesauro;" we must perhaps conclude from this that at that moment, that is to say, in the first years of the reign of Henry I., the institution described later by the author of the Dialogus already existed in its essential features, with its attributes at once financial and judicial, but that the accounts of the sheriffs were not yet received on the chequered cloth, since the term Scaccarium has not yet replaced the term Thesaurus. Doubtless the sheriffs were accounted with by means of "tallies," the notched sticks of which Stubbs speaks. The author of the Dialogus tells us indeed: "Quod autem hodie dicitur ad scaccarium, olim dicebatur ad taleas."³ It must then have been in the course of the reign of Henry I. that the substitution of the one system for the other was effected; henceforth the financial court called previously Thesaurus took, by extension, the name of Scaccarium, which denoted the table of account now in use, and which had been suggested by the appearance of the chequered cloth.⁴

1. Const. Hist., i, p. 407.

2. Commune of London, p. 94.

3. Dialogus, i, 1 (Ed. Hughes, etc., p. 60).

4. "Licet autem tabula talis scaccarium dicatur, transumitur tamen hoc nomen, ut ipsa quoque curia, que consedente scaccario est, scaccarium dicatur. . . . Que est ratio huius nominis?—Nulla mihi verior ad presens occurrit quam quia scaccarii lusilis similem habet formam." (Ibidem.)

This is the very probable view accepted by Mr. Round. But we do not see that anyone is justified in concluding from it that "the arithmetic of the Exchequer is clearly of foreign origin." It would be necessary indeed to prove: (1) that this system of accounting was not known previously in England; we have already expressed our doubt on this head; (2) that it was employed previously on the Continent. The term Exchequer is only found in the countries occupied by the Normans, but it in no wise follows that it is of Norman origin. It may equally well be of English origin. The considerations brought forward on that point by Stubbs retain all their force, even since the discovery by Mr. Round in a Merton Cartulary of proof that there was an Exchequer in Normandy in 1130 at the very latest.¹ Indeed there is nothing to preclude the adoption of the chequered cloth in England being anterior by some years to this date.

The Norman origin, therefore, of the arithmetic employed in the twelfth century is very far from being proved. As regards the staff of the Upper Exchequer, it is true that the great officers who sit there bear essentially French titles. When we compare the little work entitled Constitutio Domus Regis with the Dialogus de Scaccario, we note that "with a few exceptions every important officer in the financial department has his place in the household. It may be added that the constitution of the household is so clearly of Frankish origin that it is not possible even to doubt that its organization was originally imported from abroad."¹ But again, we must be agreed on the nature of the point at issue. The important thing, be it remembered, is to distinguish what influence the Norman Conquest can have had on the development of the financial organization.

The staff of the Upper Exchequer may have been formed before the Conquest

1. Bernard the King's scribe, in English Historical Review, xiv, 1899, pp. 425 sqq. The document in question relates to a lawsuit regarding a Norman estate claimed by Serlo the Deaf from Bernard the Scribe. The suit was tried at the Exchequer: "Et ibi positus fuit Serlo in misericordia regis per iudicium baronum de Scaccario, quia excoluerat terram illam super saisinam Bernardi, quam ante placitum istud disracionaverat per iudicium episcopi Luxoviensis et Roberti de Haia et multorum ad Scaccarium, etc." The document as a whole shows that we have to do with a Norman Exchequer. The bishop of Lisieux, who presided over it, it seems, resided uninterruptedly in his diocese, and Robert de la Haie was seneschal of Normandy.

We have just seen that the method of verification of the accounts and even the name Exchequer may have arisen simultaneously in England and in Normandy or in England even earlier than in Normandy. As far as concerns the great officers sitting in the financial court, the Conquest of 1066 may have equally had no influence—for the good reason that these great officers existed in England before the Conquest of 1066, and that the court of Edward the Confessor was already profoundly "Normanised." Mr. Round, whom we have constantly to quote, has shown that this king had a marshal (named Alfred), a constable (Bondig), a seneschal (Eadnoth), a butler (Wigod), a chamberlain (Hugh), a treasurer (Henry), a chancellor (Regenbald), in short the same great officers who figured at the court of the Norman dukes.² Did these personages take part in financial administration? It would be rash to affirm it at present. But all that we know of the monarchical institutions of the West at that period equally forbids us to deny it.

To sum up, we see that some new documents have been contributed to the discussion, but without throwing Conclusion any decisive light upon it. The description which Stubbs gave, thirty years ago, of the operations of the Exchequer, has been rectified and the details filled in, but his cautious conclusions upon the origin of the institution remain intact. He may have happened on other points to have underestimated excessively the effects of the Conquest of 1066 on the political development of England, but he appears to have been right in thinking that while the Exchequer manifestly contains certain Anglo-Saxon elements we cannot discern with certainty any element the introduction of which was the direct result of the Norman Conquest.¹

1. Hughes, Crump and Johnson, Introduction, p. 14.

2. Round, The officers of Edward the Confessor, in Engl. Hist. Review, xix, 1904, pp. 90—92.

1. See the bibliography of works relating to the Exchequer in Gross, Sources, § 50, and in the edition of the Dialogus referred to above, pp. vii—viii. The chief things to read are the article published by Mr. Round, in The Commune of London and Other Studies, and the introduction of Messrs. Hughes, Crump and Johnson, the merit of which we do not think of disputing. Mr. Round has brought to light the feudal, "tenurial" character of the two offices of Chamberlain and studied the mode of payment ad scalam and the ad pensum system; he has discovered also that the whole of the receipts and expenses did not appear in the Pipe Rolls, and that besides the Exchequer, the Treasury, which for a long time had its seat at Winchester, had its special accounts and its chequered cloth to verify them.

VII.

ENGLISH SOCIETY DURING THE FEUDAL PERIOD.

THE TENURIAL SYSTEM AND THE ORIGIN OF TENURE BY MILITARY SERVICE.

IN certain pages of his work Stubbs, either in dealing with the Norman Conquest or in order to give an understanding of the elements which composed the solemn assemblies of the Curia Regis, incidentally explains what an earl, a baron and a freeholder were, and expresses his opinion on the origin of tenure by knight-service.¹ We shall consider here the question as a whole, and at a slightly different angle, in order that the reader may the more clearly account for the differences which separate English and French society during that period.

In spite of the "feudalization" of England by the Normans, the principles which distinguished men from one another in England were not the same as on the Continent. Differences of terminology already warn us that the institutions are not identical. The word vassallus is very seldom met with; alodium, in Domesday Book, does not denote an estate not held of a lord; but doubtless simply a piece of land transmissible to a man's heirs; it is very nearly the sense of feodum, which has a very vague meaning in English documents. It is said that So-and-so "tenet in feodo," if his rights are heritable, even when he has only the obligations of an agricultural tenant towards his lord.²

1. Const. Hist., i, pp. 283 sqq., 389 sqq., 604 sqq.

2. Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 152 sqq.; Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, i, pp. 234 sqq., 297. It is to this last work that we chiefly refer the reader for all that follows. He will find there a notable exposition of what we call the "feudal institutions" of England. [On feodum and alodium in Domesday, cf. Vinogradoff, English Society in the Eleventh Century, pp. 232—8.]

And, indeed, there is, properly speaking, no distinct feudal law in England. There, "feudal law is not a special law applicable only to one fairly definite set of relationships, or applicable only to one class or estate of men; it is just the common law of England."¹ The English nobility is not therefore separated from the non-noble class, as in France, by a whole body of customs which constitutes for it a special private law. It is public law which gives it a place apart and a superiority very different, for the rest, from those which the French baronage claimed. The English baronage was founded by the Norman monarchy, and owed its riches and privileges to it.

The barones majores are those whom the king has endowed with rich estates² and whom he summons to

1. Pollock and Maitland, English Law, i, pp. 235-236.

2. It is well-known that these estates, instead of forming compact principalities like those of the French dukes and counts, were generally scattered over several counties. Mr. Round has proved that this disposition, a singularly favourable one to the monarchy and attributed by historians to the political genius of William the Conqueror, frequently originated in the uncompactness of the properties of the Anglo-Saxon thegns. "It is often urged," he says, "that William deliberately scattered a fief over several counties in order to weaken its holder's power. But this scattering might be only the result of granting the estate of a given thegn. Thus, in Hampshire, Alured of Marlborough had, in both his manors, succeeded a certain Carle, who was also his 'antecessor' in Surrey and Somerset, and in the bulk of his Wiltshire lands. Arnulf de Hesdin had for his predecessor, in his two Hampshire manors, an Edric, who was clearly also his 'predecessor' in the three he held in Somerset, and in some of his lands in Gloucestershire, Wilts. and Dorset. In like manner Nigel the physician held lands in Wiltshire, Herefordshire and Shropshire, as well as in Hampshire, because in all four counties he had succeeded Spirtes, a rich and favoured English priest. On the other hand, a Domesday tenant-in-chief may have received a congeries of manors lying in a single shire. Of this there is a very striking instance in the fief of Hugh de Port. Except for two manors in Cambridgeshire, and one apiece in Bucks and Dorset, the whole fief lay in Hampshire," where he held fifty-six manors from the crown, and thirteen from the bishop of Bayeux. (Victoria History of Hampshire, i, 421-422; cf. Hertfordshire, i, 1902, p. 277; cf. also the case quoted by F. M. Stenton, Vict. Hist. of Derbyshire, i, 1905, p. 305).

Mr. Round admits also that side by side with the cases in which the companions of William received the entire estates of rich Englishmen, we have examples of Anglo-Saxon estates divided between several Normans, and estates formed for Normans from numerous small English estates. (Vict. Hist. of Essex, i, 353.)

The barons the Commune Concilium by individual letters; some of them are honoured by him with the title of earl and bear the sword of the earldom. The English aristocracy is to be a political aristocracy, a high nobility formed of privileged individuals, transmitting their power to the eldest son.¹

In the same way the knights who are to play so important a rôle in constitutional history, do not enjoy a very peculiar personal status; but, as The knights Stubbs shows, the carrying into effect of the judicial system inaugurated by Henry II. depends on their loyal co-operation; they are a class of notables, charged with judicial functions which can only be devolved upon men of trust. Apart from this distinctive feature, no barrier separates the knights from the rest of the freemen; military service is not strictly confined to the tenure by knight service, and the knight's fee might even be held by a freeman who was not a knight.

To sum up, in England there is no legal personal distinction except between the free and the un-free; but liber does not mean noble, although this Meaning of has been lately maintained.² In its liber homo narrower meaning, at least in certain passages, the liber homo of the English realm, far from designating the noble in opposition to the non-noble person, designates the non-noble freeman as opposed to the noble.³ In its wider significance, liber homo means: one who is not a serf; it is in this sense that the Great Charter is granted to the liberi homines of the realm. It is as liber homo, not as noble, that the noble has personal rights.¹

1. On all this comments will be found, which, if not original, are at least formulated with much precision and vigour, in E. Boutmy, Développement de la Constitution et de la Société politique en Angleterre, pp. 13 sqq., and English Translation by I. M. Eaden (The English Constitution), 1891, pp. 3 sqq.

2. According to M. Guilhiermoz, Origines de la Noblesse, p. 364, in England, liberi homines signifies gentilshommes, and liberi tenentes signifies possessors of noble fiefs or holdings. This theory is no truer of England than it is of France.

3. See the case of 1222 quoted by W. E. Rhodes, Engl. Histor. Review, xviii, 1903, p. 770: the rate of the contribution paid for the deliverance of the Holy Land is 1s. for the knight and 1d. only for the liber homo.

But social relations in England rested, above all, on another principle—that of tenure, which was applied to almost the whole of the population, from the king, from whom every tenure depends mediately or immediately, down to the humblest serf cultivating the land of his lord.² There was not an inch of English soil which was not subjected to this single formula: ‘Z. tenet terram illam de . . . domino rege,’ Z. being either tenens in capite or separated from the king by more or less numerous intermediaries. This formula applies to all those who have a parcel of land, even to the farmer, even to the serf cotter, and it equally applies to the religious communities who hold land from a donor without owing him anything in return save prayers. Vagabonds and proletarians excepted, who must, I imagine, have existed always and everywhere in country and town,³ all the English of the Middle Ages were tenants, and tenure, in the eyes of the lawyers, was much more important than personal status.⁴ The distinction even between free and non-free in this country was practically a distinction between tenures much more than a distinction between persons.⁵

1. See the exposition and application of this fact in Pollock and Maitland, i, pp. 408 sqq.

2. See above, p. 23.

3. On the floating population of the country, the “undersette” and the “levingmen” see Vinogradoff, Villainage, pp. 213, 214.

4. Let us add that one and the same person might have tenements of different categories. Pollock and Maitland, English Law, i, p. 296, quote the instance of Robert d’Aguilon, who held lands from different lords, by military service, in sergeantry, in socage, etc.

5. See Pollock and Maitland, i, p. 232 sqq., 356 sqq., 407. The customs which we call feudal, such as rights of relief, of wardship, of marriage, etc., attached themselves not to the person but to the tenure by knight service. In practice, of course, they were subjects of the keenest interest for members of the nobility, and it is for this reason, that, in the Great Charter, the baronage took particular precautions to prevent the crown from abusing them. Pollock and Maitland, pp. 307 sqq. study these customs and try to determine in what measure they were peculiar to the tenure by knight service. Sometimes tenure in socage was subject to the rights of wardship and of marriage.

Let us leave aside servile tenures, of which we have spoken in studying the problem of the manor. The Free tenures free tenures at the end of the historical period dealt with in Stubbs' first volume may be grouped into the following principal types:—

1. Tenure in frankalmoin, in liberam elemosinam, in free alms. It is theoretically the land given to the Church, without any temporal service being demanded in return; it is agreed or understood that the community will pray for the donor. In practice, tenure in frankalmoin admits of certain temporal services, and its clearest characteristic, at the end of the twelfth century, is that judicially it is subject only to the ecclesiastical forum.

Tenure in frankalmoin
Tenure by knight service 2. Tenure by knight service, per servitium militare. The holder of a knight's fee owes in theory military service for forty days. In the twelfth century the king often demanded, instead of personal service, a tax called scutage.¹

The usual rate was two marks on the knight's fee, and it has been pointed out that that sum was equal to the

1. Stubbs discusses scutage in several passages; see vol. i, pp. 491-492, 494, 624-625. He rightly remarks that this term did not always denote a tax to replace military service. But, both in regard to the origin of scutage and in regard to the obligations imposed, when it was levied, on those who held land by knight service, he should have taken account of recent work, and not have contented himself with referring in a single line to Mr. Round's article which is in absolute contradiction with some of the conclusions to which Stubbs continued to adhere. Mr. Round took up the question of scutage again, in the course of a bitter controversy with Mr. Hubert Hall, editor of the Red Book of the Exchequer. (See the bibliography in Gross, No. 1917.) An excellent piece of work by an American scholar, J. F. Baldwin, should also be read: The scutage and knight service in England, Chicago, 1897. Briefly, there is no ground for considering scutage as an innovation of the reign of Henry II.; the tax in substitution for military service and even the word scutagium already existed under Henry I. On the other hand, scutage only dispensed from military service if the king thought fit: his subjects had not the right to choose. (See Pollock and Maitland, English Law, i, pp. 267 sqq.) Scutage, from the beginning of the 13th century, came to be a tax like any other; no exemption was granted in exchange. Mr. Baldwin shows, moreover, that its financial importance has been exaggerated. The question of scutage will be definitely elucidated when all the Pipe Rolls anterior to the middle of the 13th century, the period at which scutage fell into desuetude, have been published and studied.

pay of a knight hired for forty days. The king's servants reckoned, in the thirteenth century, that William the Conqueror had created 32,000 knights' fees. It has been calculated that in reality the king of England could not count on more than 5,000 knights.¹ Legally, military service was a regale servitium. The right of private war was not recognised. In practice, the lords reckoned on the knights whom they had enfeoffed to sustain their personal quarrels and not merely to provide the service demanded by the king from each of his tenants-in-chief; there were some even who maintained more knights than their obligations towards the king required.

3. Tenure in serjeanty. The servientes, serjeants (officers of every kind from the seneschal or the constable to the cook or messenger), received land from the king or the lord whom they served on a tenure called serjanteria. The obligations of this tenure were sometimes agricultural, sometimes military. Holders of military serjeanties only differed from knights by their lighter equipment.

4. Tenure in free socage, in socagio. From the end of the twelfth century it can be said that all free tenure which is neither frankalmoin nor knight service nor serjeanty, is tenure in socage. Land can be held in socage by the most diverse persons; by a younger son of a family, who has received it from his father, by a great personage who holds it of the king on condition of a rent or of agricultural services, or, finally, a very ordinary case, by free peasants. These last owe the lord a rent or services, and their economic condition frequently approaches that of the un-free villeins; but these freeholders are bound directly to the king by an oath of allegiance, often take even an actual oath of homage to their lord and form part of the county court and the juries.

1. Round, Feudal England, pp. 264—265, 292.

In the category of tenure in socage we may class the tenure in burgage, peculiar to the Tenure in burgage burgesses of the towns with charters.

What is the origin of the English tenures? The systematization, the symmetrical simplification and the legal theory of tenure are due to the Norman lawyers; this is not disputed. The Origin of English tenures difficulty, as we have already seen in studying the evolution of the agricultural classes, is to ascertain in what proportions the feudal and seignorial principles brought from the Continent by the Norman invaders underwent admixture with Anglo-Saxon traditions in order to produce, in the world of reality, the new régime. Stubbs approached the problem from several sides, but never stated it with all the clearness desirable. We have already said that several scholars of our generation, notably Messrs. Maitland and Round, have done much to define its terms and advance its solution, although they are far from being always in agreement.

We have treated of the origin of peasant tenures above. There is another side to the problem, if not as interesting at least as obscure: this is the origin of Problem of military service and of tenure by knight service feudal military service and of tenure by knight service. Mr. Round seems to have definitively elucidated this difficult subject.

It is another reason for giving it our attention for some moments; Stubbs was content to refer, in a note, to Mr. Round's article, without modifying, as he should have done, the rather confused and hesitating pages which he devotes to the knight's fee and knight service.

Stubbs, and with him the historians of the Germanist school, such as Gneist, Freeman, and, in our own day, Mr. Maitland, have more or less a tendency to see in the military organization of the Germanist theory.
Anglo-Saxon origin last Anglo-Saxon centuries "a strong impulse towards a national feudalism."¹

1. Const. Hist., i, p. 208.

The king's warrior is the thegn, that is to say, according to Stubbs, the man who possesses five hides of land of his own;¹ moreover, we see that in Berkshire, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, it was the custom to furnish a warrior (miles) for every five hides. Military service is not yet attached to a special tenure, but the military obligation is linked already with the possession of land instead of being, as formerly, a personal obligation of the whole free population. Stubbs thinks that, England once subjected by the Normans, "the obligation of national defence was incumbent as of old on all landowners, and the customary Unit of service service of one fully-armed man for each five in the host hides was probably the rate at which the newly-endowed follower of the king would be expected to discharge his duty."²

According to Gneist, William the Conqueror made this Anglo-Saxon usage into a legal rule which he imposed "on the entire body of old and new possessors of the land;" but the rate of five hides was only an approximate indication, and in reality military obligations were fixed according to the productive value of the estates (Gneist even thinks that the principal object of Domesday Book was to permit of this fixing of military obligations). The feuda militum, the knights' fees, were units worth £20 a year.

Stubbs takes the same view, adding that nevertheless

1. Stubbs, adopting the views of K. Maurer, claims (i, p. 173) that the name of thegn was given to all those who possessed the proper quantity of land, that is to say five hides. This theory is inadmissible. It is founded on two wrongly interpreted texts. One of them is that which we have quoted above in our note on the Burh-geat, p. 39 note 2. We need only read it as a whole to perceive that more than the possession of five hides was required in order to become a thegn. The holding of five hides was doubtless the normal and traditional estate of the thegn, but there were rustici who possessed as much or more land, without thereby becoming thegns. See A. G. Little, Gesiths and Thegns, in English Histor. Review, iv, 1889, pp. 726—729.

2. Const. Hist., i, pp. 284 sqq. We are trying here to give a coherent account of the thesis of the Germanists, and we shall not bring out the contradictions in detail which Stubbs' argument presents; Mr. Round does this (op. cit., pp. 232-233).

“ it must not be assumed that the establishment of the knight’s fee was other than gradual.”

Gradual formation of the system

William the Conqueror did not create the knights’ fees at a stroke; there is, as regards this, a great difference between the state of things which is described in Domesday and that which the charter of Henry I. allows us to divine, and we may even say that the formation of the military fiefs took more than a century to accomplish, and was not yet completed in the reign of Henry II. It was the subject of a long series of arrangements.¹

Thus Anglo-Norman military tenure would be derived from the Anglo-Saxon usages, and nevertheless would only have been established very slowly.

Mr. Round’s
objections

Mr. Round² has no difficulty in showing the weakness of these theories. If the number of knights which each great vassal had to furnish to the king depended on the number of hides in his estates or on their value in annual revenue, if the king required a knight for each unit of five hides, or for a land unit producing £20 a year, and if the knight’s fee represented that unit precisely, what remained for the baron? Obligated to divide the whole of his estate into military fiefs, was he then despoiled of all? The supposition is absurd; the argument of Stubbs and Gneist, however, leads directly to it. Moreover, the alleged slowness with which the feudal military system constituted itself is not seriously proved. The argument ex silentio drawn from Domesday Book is worth nothing, first, because the object of Domesday was fiscal not military, and, secondly, because a closer study of that document demonstrates beyond question the existence of military tenure. We are told that under the first Norman kings certain great estates were not yet divided into knights’ fees; but we must not conclude from this that they were not subject to military obligations; here lies the chief flaw in Stubbs' argument. On his reasoning it would seem that the existence of feudal military service and the existence of knights' fees were bound up together, and that the king had himself to devise a rule for the formation of these fees. But this was not the case. In order to form his host, the king addressed himself to his barons,¹ his tenants-in-chief alone, and demanded from each of them so many knights; but the manner in which each of them procured them did not concern him directly.

1. Const. Hist., i, pp. 285 sqq., 468 sqq.

2. Introduction of knight service into England in Feudal England, pp. 225 sqq.; cf. his Geoffrey de Mandeville, p. 103, and Vict. Hist. Worc. i, 250.

Gneist, Stubbs and Freeman, Mr. Round very rightly remarks, lose sight of the real problem to be solved, and immerse themselves in generalisations and vague writing about the "gradual evolution" of the institution. "For them," he writes,² "the introduction of knight-service means the process of sub-infeudation on the several fiefs; for me it means the grant of fiefs to be held from the crown by knight-service. Thus the process which absorbs the attention of the school whose views I am opposing is for me a matter of mere secondary importance. The whole question turns upon the point whether or not the tenants-in-chief received their fiefs to hold of the crown by a quota of military service, or not. If they did, it would depend simply on their individual inclinations, whether, or how far, they had recourse to sub-infeudation. It was not a matter of principle at all; it was, as Dr. Stubbs himself puts it, "a matter of convenience," a mere detail. What we have to consider is not the relation between the tenant-in-chief and his under-tenants, but that between the king and his tenants-in-chief: for this was the primary relation that determined all below it."

1. I use "baron" here in the sense which it generally has of direct vassal, tenant-in-chief. Mr. Tait (Medieval Manchester, 1904, pp. 14 sqq., 182 sqq.) observes that in the 11th and early part of the 12th century any considerable military tenant might be called a baron whether he held of the crown or not. Little by little the appellation was restricted to the tenants-in-chief.

2. Feudal England, p. 247.

Mr. Round next asks himself what were the obligations imposed by William upon his tenants-in-chief; he concludes that the Conqueror, without issuing any written grants or charters, nevertheless fixed the obligations of each great vassal and himself settled the servitium debitum.¹

Examining, elsewhere, the replies given by the barons in 1166 to the inquest ordered by Henry II.,² he remarks that, save for rare exceptions which cannot invalidate the principle, the barons and the bishops owe to the king a number of knights varying from 10 to 100,³ and which is always a multiple of 10 or of 5. If the assessment of the servitium debitum conformed to a precise estimate of the value of the barony, the adoption of these round figures is incomprehensible; we can understand it on the contrary, if we observe that the English consta-

The amount fixed in relation to the unit of the host

1. Mr. Round chiefly invokes the testimony of the monastic chroniclers. He quotes in addition the following unpublished writ, which he dates 1072: "W. rex Anglorum, Athew' abbati de Evesham salutem. Precipio tibi quod submoneas omnes illos qui sub ballia et iustitia sunt, quatinus omnes milites quo[s] mihi debent paratos habeant ante me ad octavas Pentecostes apud Clarendunam. Tu etiam illo die ad me venias et illos quinque milites quos de abbazia tua mihi debes tecum paratos adducas. Teste Eudone dapifero. Apud Wintoniam." (Feudal England, p. 304.)

2. The object of the inquest of 1166 was to fix and as far as possible increase the resources which might be expected from scutage, which was paid, as is well known, on the scutum or knight's fee. Mr. Round has shown very well how the replies of the barons were always interpreted to their disadvantage. These cartae of the barons, transcribed in the Black Book and the Red Book of the Exchequer, answered the following questions: How many knights had been provided with a knight's fee in the barony before the death of king Henry I.? How many since? If the number of knights' fees created was not equal to the number of knights to be furnished, how many knights on the demesne, that is to say, not enfeoffed, did the baron furnish? What were the names of the knights? Apropos of the expression super dominium, Mr. Round (p. 246, note 57) points out one of the "marvellously rare" lapses, which can be found in Stubbs; the latter has wrongly interpreted (see Const. Hist., i, p. 285, note 3) the reply of the bishop of Durham. This prelate, as a matter of fact, declared that he had already created more than 70 knights' fees. Upon the tenures of the bishopric of Durham, see an article by G. T. Lapsley, on the Boldon Book, in Victoria History of the County of Durham, i, 1905, pp. 309 sqq.

3. Robert, son of Henry I. alone furnished 100 knights. It is even rare for the servitium debitum to reach 60 knights: the most frequent figures are 30 and under.

bularia consisted of ten knights, and that the Normans, were already, at the time of the Conquest, acquainted with the military unit of ten knights. It was natural that the demands of the king from his barons should be based, not with exactitude on their resources, which, moreover, it was impossible for him to know with complete precision, but on the necessities and customs of the military system. "As against the theory that the military obligation of the Anglo-Norman tenant-in-chief was determined by the assessment of his holding, whether in hidage or in value, I maintain that the extent of that obligation was not determined by his holding, but was fixed in relation to, and expressed in terms of, the constabularia of ten knights, the unit of the feudal host. And I, consequently, hold that his military service was in no way derived or developed from that of the Anglo-Saxons, but was arbitrarily fixed by the king, from whom he received his fief." We believe, with Mr. Round, that this solution is correct, and that it "removes all difficulties."

To go back to the question which has drawn us into following Mr. Round in his long discussion, we see that the origin of military tenure or tenure by knight service is a double one: the barony was as a general rule a military holding conferred by the king from the first days of the Conquest, in return for the service of so many knights; the lands enfeoffed by the barons to knights in order to be able to fulfil the said obligation towards the king constituted a second series of military holdings.¹

This second series was formed slowly, gradually, as Stubbs says, and the crown only began to concern itself directly with them and claim to regulate the number of these sub-tenancies after the lapse of a century, at the time of the inquest of 1166, at a moment when the tax for the redemption of service, the scutage of one or two marks on the knight's fee attracted the attention of the financiers of the exchequer. It seems as if the inquest of 1166 might have given military tenure a precision and stability which it had not as yet; but the fiscal aims which the officials of the Exchequer pursued were very soon to take from tenure by knight service its primitive reason for existence and its true character. In the thirteenth century military tenure will be simply the tenure which involves payment of scutage; thus it began to decline from the time it was regularised, a fairly frequent phenomenon in the history of institutions.

1. Mr. Round, pp. 293 sqq., admits that the knight's fee was normally an estate yielding an annual revenue of 20 pounds.

What view are we to take now as regards the links some have sought to discover between the Norman military tenure and the service of the Anglo-Saxon thegn? Mr. Round rejects every idea of filiation, and even declares that his theory on the introduction of knight service into England opens the way to the examination, on a fresh basis, of kindred problems, which should be viewed from the feudal point of view, and not with the set purpose of seeing Anglo-Saxon influences everywhere. Mr. Maitland, who has since published his Domesday Book and Beyond, and the second edition of his History of English Law, admits, as proved in the "convincing papers" of Mr. Round, that the number of knights furnished by each barony was actually fixed by William the Conqueror. But he questions whether the Normans really thus introduced into England a principle which was not already applied there. Even the notion of a contract between him who receives a piece of land and him who gives it in return for military service was not foreign to the English. The ecclesiastical administrators who granted land to thegns were not squandering the fortune of the saints for nothing: they evidently intended to provide themselves with the warriors whom theory respecting Anglo-Saxon

Mr. Maitland's
military service

their land owed to the king. Such a state of things might adapt itself to a feudal explanation; perhaps even it might give rise to it. We do not know what system was practised in the east of Saxon England, where the seignorial power was weak; but in the west the substance even of the knight's fee already existed. The Bishop of Worcester held 300 hides over which he had sac and soc; he had to furnish 60 milites; now at the beginning of the reign of Henry II., it is the same number of 60 knights which is imposed upon him.¹

We find it difficult and even somewhat futile to choose between the view of Mr. Round and that of Mr. Maitland.

No direct influence upon Anglo-Norman service in the host It is probable that the Normans, at the moment of the Conquest, were entirely ignorant of the very complex and varied institutions of the Anglo-Saxons, and that, if they had found nothing in England analogous to the feudal system, they would none the less have imposed their feudal ideas and customs, conquerors as they were, and but little capable, moreover, of rapidly grasping new social and political forms. On this ground, and if we ask ourselves for what reasons William the Conqueror brought over into England the system of service in the host as it existed in France, Mr. Round may quite legitimately deny all filiation between tenure by knight-service and the five hides of the thegn about which, doubtless, the Conqueror did not trouble himself.²

But England was prepared by her past to receive and develop the feudal organisation on her soil. She was

1. Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 156 sqq.; see also pp. 294, 307-309, 317. Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, i, pp. 258-259.

2. King's thegns still exist in the reign of William the Conqueror. But they do not rank with the tenants-in-chief by military service. In Domesday they are placed after the serjeants of the shire. As a distinct social class, they disappear during the reigns of the Conqueror's sons. (See the article by F. M. Stenton on the Domesday of the county of Derby in Vict. History of Derbyshire, i, 1905, p. 307).

acquainted with commendation, with land held from a lord or from several lords superimposed, with military service due to a lord; under the form of the heriot, she was acquainted even with the right of relief; seignorial justice was widely established.¹

The feudal régime finds a favourable soil for original development

England, therefore, easily accepted the seignorial and feudal régime; but of necessity she impressed her stamp upon it. Anglo-Norman society in the twelfth century differed from French society in very important points. Words and things show this clearly; tenure in socage, which little by little absorbed all the free tenures of the Middle Ages and still exists to-day, is an Anglo-Saxon term and is derived from the status of the sochemanni. It has been said that the Anglo-Saxon régime had only produced dismemberment and anarchy, and that the Norman Conquest arrested this disintegration by the introduction of the feudal system; but did not this dismemberment and this anarchy proclaim the spontaneous formation of a native feudal system? What the Norman Conquest brought to England, which England had not at all, either in reality or germ, was not feudalism, it was a monarchic despotism based on administrative centralisation.

1. Mr. Round in the studies which the editors of the Victoria History are publishing, insists on the divergences between the Norman feudal system and Anglo-Saxon institutions (Victoria History of Surrey, i, 1902, p. 288, Hertfordshire, i, 1902, p. 278; Buckinghamshire, i, 1905, p. 218). Mr. Maitland, however, does not pretend to deny these divergences.

VIII.

THE ORIGIN OF THE TOWNS IN ENGLAND.

THERE exists no satisfactory general account of the origin of the towns in England.¹ The pages devoted to this question by Stubbs, in three of the chapters of Vol. I.,² have long been the safest guide to consult. But during the last fifteen years this problem has been the subject of studies based on thorough research which have advanced its solution, and even those with which Stubbs was able to make himself acquainted and which he has quoted sometimes in the notes to his later editions might have been turned to greater profit by him. The researches of Mr. Gross, the ingenious and disputable theories of Mr. Maitland, the discoveries of Mr. Round and Miss Mary Bateson, notably, deserve to be known by our readers. With their help we must now draw out a summary sketch, in which we shall make it our chief endeavour to give the history of the English towns its proper place in the framework of the general history of the towns of the west.

France in the Middle Ages was acquainted with infinitely varied forms of free or privileged towns, The "borough" and very diverse too are the names which were used to designate them from North to South. In England the degrees of urban enfranchise-

1. For the bibliography, see Ch. Gross, Bibliography of British Municipal History, 1897. It is an excellent repertory. But since 1897, some very important works have appeared, notably those of Miss Mary Bateson. Some years ago, English municipal history was backward compared with that of France; but the activity now displayed in that respect by scholars on the other side of the Channel contrasts with the present scarcity of good monographs on the French towns.

2. Const. Hist., i, pp. 99—102, 438—462, and 667—676.

ment are less numerous,—the upper degrees are wanting—and, in addition, a somewhat peculiar term is applied to the privileged town in the later centuries of the Middle Ages: in opposition to the villa, to the township, it is called burgus, borough, and the municipal charters often contain in their first line the characteristic formula: “Quod sit liber burgus.”¹ Hence in the works of English scholars who concern themselves with the origin of municipal liberties, the word borough is constantly made use of. It seems to us, necessary, however, to get rid of this word, which uselessly complicates and confuses the problem to be solved, and it is well to give our reasons at the outset.

The first idea that the word borough summons up is that of the “bonne ville” as it used to be called in France; that is to say, the town which sent representatives to the assemblies of the three estates. In fact, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the borough is the town which is represented in the House of Commons. But if we are not content to stop short at this external characteristic, and if we enquire in virtue of what principles a town is selected to be represented in Parliament, we are obliged to recognise that such principles do not exist, that the list of boroughs is arbitrarily drawn up by the sheriffs, and that it even varies to a certain extent. In the period before the application of the parliamentary system, is the boundary line which separates the boroughs from the simple market towns and villages any clearer?

Already, in his valuable book on the gild merchant, which is so full of ideas, facts and documents, Mr. Gross had observed that the term liber burgus is a very vague one, applying to a group of franchises the number of which gradually grew in the course of centuries, and none of which, if we examine carefully the relative position of the burgi and the villae, was rigorously reserved to the burgi, or indispensable to constitute a burgus.¹ First among them was judicial independence :

1. See, for example, in Stubbs' Select Charters, 8th edition, pp. 311, 313, etc. Upon this expression see below, page 69, note 2.

The judicial criterion the burgesses of the *liber burgus*² had not to appear before the courts of the shire and the hundred.³

In a quite recent work Miss Mary Bateson expresses the opinion that we have there in fact the characteristic of the borough : it is by its court of justice that the borough, detached from the hundred and forming as it were a hundred by itself, is distinguished from the Norman period onwards, from the township and the market town. It may have been originally a township, it may continue to be a manor in the eyes of its lord ; it is none the less, from a legal point of view, an entirely special institution, which has its place outside the shire and the hundred. It is not a slow evolution, it is a formal act, which gives it this place apart, and which makes of the word borough a technical term corresponding to a definite legal conception.⁴ Undoubtedly there is much

1. Gross, Gild Merchant, 1890, i, pp. 5 sqq. Cf. A. Ballard, English boroughs in the reign of John, in English Histor. Review, xiv, 1899, p. 104.

2. According to Mr. Tait (Medieval Manchester, p. 62 ; Cf. Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, i, 639) the expression liber burgus would denote simply the substitution of the tenure in burgagium and its customs for the villein services and merchetum of the rural manor ; and where it does not appear in the charter, it is because burgage-tenure existed before the granting of the charter. We do not think that this interpretation is sufficiently broad. Liber burgus often has a much more general sense, notably in the following document of the year 1200 relating to the town of Ipswich (published in Gross, Gild Merchant, ii, p. 117 : "Item eodem die ordinatum est per commune concilium dicte villate quod de cetero sint in burgo predicto duodecim capitales portmenni jurati, sicut in aliis liberis burgis Anglie sunt, et quod habeant plenam potestatem pro se et tota villata ad gubernandum et manutenendum predictum burgum et omnes libertates ejusdem burgi, etc.") truth in this theory. But we cannot decidedly accept it in its entirety. The court of justice did not suffice, any more than the tenure in burgagium or the firma burgi, to constitute a borough, at the period at which men claimed to distinguish clearly between the boroughs and the market towns.¹ And, a fortiori, this must have been the case during the Norman period.

3. Upon the great importance of the jurisdiction of the English towns in the early period, a jurisdiction which extended to "causae majores," see Mary Bateson, Borough Customs, ii, 1906, p. xx.

4. Mary Bateson, Medieval England, 1903, pp. 124, 125 ; cf. the same author's Borough Customs, i, 1904, pp. xii sqq. ; controversy with Mr. Ballard in English Historical Review, xx, 1905, pp. 146 sqq.

The criterion of "incorporation" We might be tempted to admit, with Mr. Maitland, that it is the character of a corporation,² which is the essential part in the conception of a borough. But "incorporation" is a legal notion, for which the facts no doubt prepared the way, but which was not stated in precise form until towards the end of the thirteenth century. For the twelfth and preceding centuries we must give up the attempt to find an exact definition of burgus. During the Anglo-Saxon period, and even in the eleventh century, the word burh had an extremely general signification. It does not even exclusively denote a town, but is also applied to a fortified house, a manor, a farm surrounded by walls.³

It should be observed that the important towns are also designated, for example in Domesday Book, by the name of civitates; like almost all the words in the language of the Middle Ages, civitas and burgus have no precise and strict application.⁴ The difficulty would be the same, or nearly so, if one attempted to define the French commune not in an a priori fashion but after comparison of all the passages in which the word is

1. See the case of Manchester: Tait, op. cit. pp. 52 sqq. Cf. Pollock and Maitland, English Law, i, 640.

2. Corpus corporatum et politicum, communitas, etc. See Gross, Gild Merchant, i, pp. 93 sqq.; Pollock and Maitland, i, pp. 669 sqq.; and above all Maitland, Township and Borough, 1898.

3. W. H. Stevenson, in English Historical Review, xii, 1897, p. 491.

4. In France, civitas denotes a bishop's see; and this is often the case in England, but not uniformly. Cf. Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, 1897, p. 183, note 1; Township and Borough, p. 91; Round, in Victoria History of the counties, Essex, i, 1903, pp. 414, 415. Upon the definition of the modern city, see G. W. Wilton, The county of the city in the Juridica Review (Edinburgh), April, 1906, pp. 65 sqq.

employed. In the same way that there is an advantage in making use of this convenient word to denote our most independent towns, it may be of service to use the word borough, when we are studying the English towns of the end of the Middle Ages. But, for the period of origins, which is the only one we have before us at present, it is better not to embarrass ourselves with this expression which by its misleading technical appearance has perhaps greatly contributed to plunge certain English scholars into blind alleys. It will be enough to ask ourselves how the towns were formed which have a court of justice and a market, which have a trading burgess population, which have sooner or later obtained a royal or baronial charter, and which, both by a variable body of privileges and by their economic development, have distinguished themselves from the simple agricultural groups; whether they were destined to be called boroughs or market towns matters little.

There is no imperious necessity for formulating the problem any differently from the way it has been formulated for the towns of the Continent, and it is for this reason that we have not entitled this essay: The Origin of the Boroughs. The question which directly interests general history is to know how the English towns were formed. It is doubtful whether this problem can ever be solved with absolute certainty,¹ but that is no reason for not approaching it at all.²

1. Cf. the reflections of Mrs. Green, Town Life in the fifteenth century, 1894, Preface, p. xi. Mrs. Green appears to think that it is better to lay aside for the present the study of municipal origins.

2. We make no pretence of treating here of the problem of the origin of municipal liberties, or of explaining what those liberties were. Stubbs has dealt very fully with the question, and we should risk repeating him. A systematic enumeration of the privileges of the "boroughs" will be found in Pollock and Maitland, English Law, i, pp. 643 sqq., and the excellent book of Ch. Gross, The Guild Merchant, may be read with the greatest profit; the second volume of this work is composed of original documents of the highest interest for English municipal history as a whole.

Domesday Book alone can give a solid point of departure for this study. The relatively abundant sources of the Anglo-Saxon period, laws, charters or chronicles, furnish only a very meagre quota to what we know of the towns before the Conquest. It is fortunate again that the "tempus regis Edwardi" was a matter of interest to the commissioners of King William, that we can project the light emanating from Domesday on the later times of Anglo-Saxon rule,—obscured though that light may often be.¹

The most serious gap in our sources may be guessed: we have no information as to the filiation which may exist between certain English towns of the Middle Ages, and the towns founded on the same site by the Roman conquerors.²

The question of Roman origin

During the period of the Roman domination there were no great towns in England.³ It is believed that

Roman towns in England

Verulamium (St. Albans, in Hertfordshire) was a municipium; only four coloniae are known: Colchester, Lincoln, Gloucester and York. London was already the principal commercial centre, but we know almost nothing about it. There was without doubt a fairly large number of little towns; the names of some thirty of them have come down to us. Winchester, Canterbury, Rochester, Dorchester, Exeter, Leicester, etc., existed, and doubtless had a germ of municipal organisation. But, in the first place, we know nothing of this organisation, no important municipal

1. On the mainly fiscal nature of Domesday, in which, moreover, a certain number of very important towns do not figure, see Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 1 sqq., and A. Ballard, Domesday Boroughs, 1904, pp. 1 sqq.; above p. 18.

2. We have still less information, naturally, respecting Celtic origins. London seems to have arisen from a small, pre-Roman town. It is well known that the first mention of London is to be found in the Annales of Tacitus, bk. xiv, c. 33, ad ann. 61: "Londinium . . . copia negotiatorum et comestuum maxime celebre. . ."

3. See the works cited above, p. 12, note 3. On the places at which the Romans built towns see Haverfield, Romano-British Warwickshire, in Victoria History of Warwickshire, i, 1904, p. 228.

inscription having been preserved. Again, we have no idea what became of the Romano-British towns during the tempest of the invasions. At least the precise knowledge which we possess only relates to the disappearance of certain of them, burnt by the Anglo-Saxons, or else completely abandoned, like that curious

Silchester Calleva Atrebatum (near the present village of Silchester, in Hampshire), of which it has become possible to say—so much have excavations been facilitated in our day by this rapid and definitive abandonment—that it is the best known archæologically of all the Roman provincial towns. Calleva Atrebatum, after the extinction of the imperial government (about 407), was still inhabited for about a century; a recent discovery has shown that they had again begun to speak and write the Celtic language there; then, at the approach of the Germanic invaders the town was completely evacuated, and has never since been inhabited.¹ Other towns, such as Winchester (Venta Belgarum), appear, on the contrary, to have survived the catastrophes of the sixth century; but we know nothing of their ancient institutions.² It is more than probable that they resembled those of the Roman towns of the

Romanist theories

Continent, and in consequence differed essentially from the municipal franchises of the Middle Ages. Nevertheless Th. Wright³ and H. C. Coote⁴ have asserted the continuity of municipal life in England, the filiation of the urban institutions of

1. See the very interesting articles by Mr. Haverfield: The last days of Silchester, in English Histor. Review, xix, 1904, pp. 625 sqq.; Silchester in the Vict. Hist. of Hampshire, i, pp. 271 sqq. Cf. ibidem, pp. 350 sqq., the archæological description by G. E. Fox and W. H. St. John Hope. See also the description of Castor, near Peterborough, in Victoria History of Northamptonshire, i, 1902, pp. 166 sqq. Mr. Haverfield believes that Castor was an old Celtic settlement.

2. See Haverfield, Victoria History of Hampshire, i, pp. 285 sqq.

3. The Celt, the Roman and the Saxon, illustrated by ancient remains, 1st edition, 1852, 4th edition, 1885.

4. A neglected fact in English History, 1864; The Romans of Britain, 1878.

the Middle Ages and of the Roman period. We can only repeat what Stubbs says of this same theory which he found again in Pearson's History of England. All the analogies on which the Romanists rely are susceptible of a different and much more probable explanation.¹ He might have added that most French scholars agree to-day in rejecting this filiation as far as concerns even the most profoundly and anciently Romanised parts of Gaul where municipal life was most intense.² What chance remains of there having been continuity in a country like Great Britain in which the imperial domination was much less solidly established? The humble village, with its tenacious agricultural customs, was able to maintain itself as it was, so it is supposed, in the storm of the Germanic conquest, but not the municipality with its institutions.

Certain towns, however, in the material sense of the word, were able, I repeat, to survive the great catastrophe.

Probable persistence of some settlements

In spite of the disdain of the Germans for fortified refuges, the ramparts of the Roman towns and imperial fortresses must have been utilised, doubtless even kept in repair for a certain time by the invaders as well as by the invaded,³ and certain Anglo-Saxon burhs must have been only the continuation or the resurrection of Roman fortified places. Such may have been the case with Winchester, Lincoln, Canterbury. In Gaul, a great number of Roman towns perished during the invasion; others, in spite of terrible misfortunes continued to be inhabited, while losing every vestige of their ancient political institutions; life concentrated itself in some particularly favourable quarter, easy of defence, or, with the materials of the abandoned houses, a square castrum

1. Const. Hist., i, p. 99, note 3.

2. See Flach, Orig. de l'ancienne France, ii, pp. 227 sqq.

3. One of the most ancient Anglo-Saxon charters, No. 1 of the Codex Diplomaticus of Kemble, dated 604, speaks of a rampart (wealles).

was constructed, to which the sadly reduced population confined itself.¹ It is probable that this phenomenon of the preservation of fragments of urban life occurred in Britain as elsewhere, and the Germanists have no serious grounds for denying its possibility. In the material sense of the word, certain English urban groups may have continued the Roman town.

Stubbs, as we have seen, does not put this supposition absolutely aside. For the rest, if his study of the

Formation of English towns.
Different influences

Anglo-Saxon town is a little wanting in clearness and vigour, at any rate it avoids thereby the faults of too systematic an exposition, and when he examines the formation of the burh, which, in his eyes, is nothing but "a more strictly organised form of the township,"² he assigns a great share to the most diverse influences, and the wealth and variety of the information which his text and notes furnish has not perhaps been sufficiently noticed or turned to profit. We believe with

Towns born from villages

him that in England, as in France, many of the urban communities grew out of pre-existent villages.³ The rural, agricultural character of the town is particularly remarkable in England during the whole of the Middle Ages. Those who study its history, "have fields and pastures on their hands."⁴ Part of the townsmen—doubtless the descendants of the most ancient inhabitants—are

1. See Flach, op. cit., pp. 238-9; Pirenne, Orig. des constitutions urbaines, in Rev. Historique, lvii, pp. 59 sqq.

2. We may guess what reading and comparisons inspired Stubbs with this theory, which derives the institutions of the town from those of the village, and which is rejected to-day by most scholars, doubtless in too absolute a manner: G. L. von Maurer, whose ideas had so much influence on him, alleges in his Geschichte der Städteverfassung in Deutschland (1869-1871) that every town is derived from a mark community. Since then, von Below has adopted the theory again in a less inadmissible form (Ursprung der deutschen Stadtverfassung, 1892); cf. Vinogradoff, Growth of the Manor, p. 148.

3. See the case of Derby in F. M. Stenton's article on the Domesday of Derbyshire, Victoria History of Derbyshire, i, 1905, pp. 308, 309.

4. Maitland, Township and Borough, p. 9.

husbandmen, the cultivated lands are sometimes found even inside the walls, and whatever may have been said to the contrary there are lands belonging to the community of burgesses.¹

But the towns must have developed above all "in the places pointed out by nature as suited for trade,"²

Influence of commerce whether these places were still uninhabited or whether ancient Roman towns or villages existed there already. It was the interest of the kings and magnates to create markets there, which brought them in good revenues, and to guarantee the security of trade;³ merchants perhaps founded colonies there, as in

The monasteries Germany and France. The "great monasteries in which the Anglo-Saxon bishops had their sees," were also by their economic importance, by the industrial and commercial needs, which the service of religion gave rise to, by the attraction which celebrated relics exercised, centres of urban concentration and work, and Stubbs notes that in the Anglo-Saxon version of Bede the equivalent given for urbana loca is mynster-stowe.⁴

Throughout the West the castles also formed the nuclei of urban groupings; they offered a refuge in case of attack, and it was the lord's interest to have for his neighbours artisans and

1. Cf. Maitland, op. cit. and Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 200 sqq.; J. Tait, English Historical Review, xii, 1897, p. 776; and Ballard, Domesday Boroughs, pp. 87 sqq.

2. Stubbs, Const. Hist. i, 99.

3. On the creation of markets, the prohibition of buying and selling elsewhere, the idea of preventing the sale of stolen objects, the market place, etc., see Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 192 sqq.

4. The inventory of the rents and dues owing to the Abbey of St. Riquier (Hariulf, Chron. de Saint Riquier, ed. Ferd. Lot, 1894, Appendix vii) shows us, as early as the year 831, a numerous population of lay artisans grouped in streets according to their trades around that abbey, and in return for lands which are granted to them, furnishing some, tools, others bindings, or clothes or articles of food, etc. This very curious document has, it seems to us, the value of a general explanation, in the history of the monasteries and the monastic towns of the West.

merchants who could supply him with cheap goods.¹ It must have been the same in England. In any case it is quite clear that at one period every English town took on a military character. We may assume that this transformation which was to complete the constitution of towns clearly distinct from villages, took place in the time of Alfred. Until then the word burh denoted not a town, but a fortified house belonging to a king or a magnate.² In the eighth century the urban settlements, old or new, with the exception perhaps of those which may have grown up around one of these fortified houses, no longer had or never had any serious defence; so that the Danes, when they invaded eastern England in the ninth century, occupied the towns without resistance. By constructing military works for their own use they completed the lesson they were giving the English.

1. The formation of the town of Bruges is quite characteristic. It was, doubtless, the favourable geographical situation of the castle of the count, which caused the town to become a great commercial city instead of remaining an insignificant market town like so many of those which arose around castles (Cf. Pirenne, op. cit., Revue Historique, lvii, p. 65). But there are many favourable sites to be met with where no town has ever been founded. It was the castle of Bruges which, to all appearance, determined the formation of the town; see the very typical passage from Jean le Long reproduced in Fagniez, Docum. relat. à l'Hist. de l'industrie et du commerce en France, 1898, i, No. 95: "Post hoc ad opus seu necessitates illorum de castello ceperunt ante portam ad pontem castelli confluere mercemanni, id est cariorum rerum mercatores, deinde tabernarii, deinde hospitarii pro victu et hospicio eorum qui negocia coram principe, qui ibidem sepe erat, prosequabantur, domus construere et hospicia preparare, ubi se recipiebant illi qui non poterant intra castellum hospitari; et erat verbum eorum: "Vadamus ad pontem": ubi tantum accreverunt habitaciones, ut statim fieret villa magna, que adhuc in vulgari suo nomen pontis habet, nempe Brugghe in eorum vulgari pontem sonat." True—and M. Fagniez should have pointed this out to his readers—Jean le Long flourished in the fourteenth century; and, as Dom Brial observes (Historiens de France, xviii, p. 593), he is not always able to distinguish the false from the true in the sources he consults. But there is every reason to accept his account of the construction of the castle of Bruges by Baldwin 'Bras de fer,' count of Flanders, in the time of Charles the Bald, and consequently the tradition which he recounts concerning the foundation of the town deserves attention.

2. On the ancient significance of the word burh and the burh-bryce, see Maitland, Domesday Book, p. 183. On the manner in which the burhs were fortified, see Round, The Castles of the Norman Conquest, in Archæologia, lviii, 1903.

Alfred (871—900) knew how to profit by it and created fortified places; and it is from his time that the word burh, instead of only denoting fortified houses, is also employed in the sense of town. We see in the Anglo-Saxon chronicle that the valiant warriors, the burh-ware, of Chichester and of London, contributed greatly to the success of the war against the Danes. Edward the Elder, son of Alfred (900—924) continued to found burhs.¹ We understand henceforth why the documents tell us of cnihts dwelling in the towns, and why the first city guilds are cnihtengilds.

Mr. Maitland has thrown a flood of light upon this foundation of military towns, which occupy a special place in the county, bear the same name as the county throughout the greater part of England,² and in some cases are planted at its geographical centre. The strategic value of these new towns explains why some of them are so small; it is not commercial prosperity nor density of population that gives the latter the special institutions which distinguish them from villages which are sometimes much larger; it is the fact that they are fortified places.

Mr. Maitland goes further. He seeks to explain by purely military causes the differentiation which took place between the township and what he calls the borough; on a study of Domesday Book which is certainly ingenious and suggestive, he bases a hypothesis which has been called the "garrison theory;" and he has been followed by another scholar, Mr. Ballard, who systematizes and exaggerates his theory.

1. In 923, Manchester was fortified and occupied by a garrison, and this is the first mention which we have of that town (Tait, Mediæval Manchester, pp. 1 sqq.).

2. The counties lying to the North of the Thames nearly all bear the name of their county-towns; for example Oxford-shire (see list of counties in Stubbs, i, p. 107). Upon this question, see Ballard, Domesday Boroughs, pp. 4 sqq.

Certain towns described in Domesday Book, these two scholars observe, are characterised by tenurial heterogeneity, being composed of houses which belong, some (the majority) to the king, others to this or that Norman lord, lay or ecclesiastic; and these houses before the Conquest belonged, some to the king, others to some thegn or other. Thus at Oxford the burgenses and their houses or haws appertain in some cases to the king, in others to a prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Winchester, of Lincoln, of Hereford, of Bayeux, of Coutances, the Abbot of Abingdon, etc.), in others again to a Norman lord (the Count of Mortain, the Count of Evreux, Walter Giffard, etc.). Domesday affords evidence that this is not a Norman innovation, for it gives us a list of thegns of the county of Oxford who, before the Conquest, so held houses in the "borough" of Wallingford. Moreover, the possession of many of these houses was in direct relation with the possession of such and such a manor in the rural part of the county; indeed the Domesday compiler frequently mentions the manor instead of the lord, and indicates how many houses the manor has in the borough; for example, the manor of Doddington has five haws in Canterbury. It is specified that before the Conquest, "tempore regis Edwardi," there were in Canterbury 259 houses thus attached to manors; and the rural estates possessing houses in Canterbury numbered thirteen. Not only houses but burgesses appertained to manors: eighty burgesses of Dunwich appertain to one of the manors of Ely, twenty-four burgesses of Leicester to the manor of Ansty, etc. These statements which puzzle the reader of Domesday, become intelligible and coherent, if we suppose that every town characterised by tenurial heterogeneity dated from the period at which the Danish invasion had to be repelled, that it was originally essentially a military post, and that its garrison and the upkeep of its ramparts were the concern of the whole county. We can understand then why, side by side with ordinary houses, there are houses which are appurtenances of rural estates, and why, at Oxford, these houses bear the name of Mural houses mansiones murales, and are burdened with the special charge of maintaining the fortifications of the town.¹ Freemen are in fact subject to the trinoda necessitas, the triple duty of repairing bridges, serving in war, and maintaining fortifications; the great rural proprietors who wish to acquit themselves of this last obligation without displacing their men, have a house in the town, furnished with burgenses, who when the king gives the order, will put in a state of defence the part of the ramparts the care of which is their charge. Many of the burgenses, moreover, are warriors, cnihts, and are maintained by the king and the great proprietors of the surrounding countryside: in this way is to be explained the mention in Domesday of burgenses attached to such and such a rural manor. In short, the primitive "borough" is essentially a fortress kept in a state of defence by the inhabitants of the county.

Later, at the end of the Anglo-Saxon period, the military spirit in the borough became enfeebled, a fact which explains the relative ease of the Norman Conquest and the difficulty which we have in reconstituting the real character of the earliest towns. In addition there grew up on the royal demesne, or upon the estates of powerful men, urban groups which obtained tardily, perhaps subsequently to the Conquest, the privileges which the simple townships did not enjoy. These are the homogeneous 'boroughs,' which are dependent on a single lord; for example, Steyning, which belongs to the Abbot of Fécamp, and whose burgesses are all the Abbot of Fécamp's men. But the real 'borough,' the primitive burgus, is that which, at the date of Domesday Book, is still dependent on numerous lords.¹

1. The service of burh-bot and the custom of Oxford are noted by Stubbs, op. cit. i, p. 102, note 4.

This theory is confronted unfortunately by unsurmountable objections.² If the inhabitants of a county ought to "contribute" to the upkeep of the ramparts and of the garrison of a particular "borough," and if it is thus that we must explain the mention of houses and burgesses appurtenant to rural manors, how comes it that Domesday Book speaks of houses appurtenant to manors which are not situated in the same county as the "borough" in which these houses stand? Why is it impossible to establish a proportion between the number of burgesses furnished by a manor and the extent of that manor, and how is the fact to be explained that a single manor of the Church of Ely maintains eighty burgesses at Dunwich?³ Why are there so many manors exempt from the burden of maintenance, why are there only three which have duties towards the town of Chester? Moreover, the peculiarities of Domesday Book, which

1. Mr. Maitland (Domesday Book and Beyond, pp. 176 sqq.) only considers specially characteristic the boroughs described in Domesday at the beginning of their county, apart from the general arrangement of fiefs, and so to speak in direct relation with the county itself. It is these that he calls county towns, and Mr. Ballard (Domesday Boroughs, p. 5) calls county boroughs. But according to Mr. Ballard (p. 43) there are other "boroughs" (he gives them the queer name of quasi county boroughs) which are not separately described at the beginning of the county, and which yet ought, from the point of view which he is taking, to be classed with the first category; the difference which separates them is of a fiscal nature, and does not directly concern the "garrison theory."

2. See the reviews of Domesday Book and Beyond by J. Tait, and of Ballard's work by Miss Mary Bateson, in the English Historical Review, xii, 1897, pp. 772 sqq. and xx, 1905, pp. 144 sqq. Cf. Round, in Victoria History of Surrey, i, 1902, pp. 285-286; Hertfordshire, i, 1902, p. 295; Essex, i, 1903, p. 385; Berkshire, i, 1906, pp. 310 sqq. Mr. Round more particularly corrects the mistakes of Mr. Ballard.

3. Dunwich, moreover, is simply described as a manor, manerium, in Domesday Book. But Mr. Ballard inserts in his list of "boroughs" all the localities to which Domesday Book attributes burgenses, and applies the garrison-theory to all of them.

the garrison theory claims to render intelligible, are for the most part capable of a simpler interpretation. Miss Bateson has elucidated the position of the burgenses appurtenant to rural manors in a very satisfactory manner. They were evidently non-resident burgesses, country people, who, with a view to gain, bought the freedom of a town, in which they might do a profitable trade. The eighty burgenses of Dunwich, appurtenant to a manor of the abbey of Ely, had doubtless bought their title, in order to come and buy the herrings which the monks needed, in that port. The houses appertaining to rural lords might serve as occasional lodgings, storehouses, etc. . . . We may add that comparative history does not allow us to consider the "tenurial heterogeneity" of so many English towns very surprising. Material and political dismemberment is the dominant feature of the French and German towns up to the eleventh century. The town was nothing but a juxtaposition of patchwork, of fragments of great estates.¹ There is no reason for attributing an absolutely original growth to the English towns, and it is, in our view, singularly rash to spin theories on their origin without constantly recalling to mind the conditions under which the towns of the Continent appear to have developed.

We propose then to accept the views of Mr. Maitland on the foundation of numerous fortified places in the time of Alfred and his successors, but to reject his theory, made even less acceptable as systematized by Mr. Ballard, on the alleged distinction, of a purely military character, between the "borough" and the township. The creative element of this distinction was doubtless, in England as on the Continent, commerce. Even at the period of the creation of the military burhs the economic factor must

Early
importance of commerce

1. Flach, Orig. de l'ancienne France, ii, pp. 243 sqq.; Pirenne, in Revue Historique, lvii, pp. 62 sqq.

have played its part; except in some cases in which strategic considerations stood in the way, the king doubtless chose trading places, which it was all important to defend and convert into defensive centres, for fortification and the development in them of the military spirit: such was evidently the case with London. It is evident, besides, that the transformation of a town into a burh must have singularly facilitated the development of its trade, since the king's peace specially protected burhs. A good situation on a navigable river or on an old Roman road, and commercial traditions, on the one hand, the special security due to the ramparts, the garrison, the king's peace, on the other hand, may have thus had a reciprocal action. The military occupation of the towns thus completed and did nothing but complete the work accomplished under the powerful stimulus of commercial and industrial needs. And it is significant that, in the Anglo-Saxon laws, we sometimes find the town designated by the name of port,¹ and that numerous charters tell us of a town's officer called port-reeve or port-gerefa.² The port is the place of commerce; it is the old name for a town in Flanders, where civic origins have a clearly economic character.³

Thus the Anglo-Saxon towns, like the towns of the

1. Notably in a passage in the laws of Athelstan, in which port is clearly synonymous with burh (Liebermann, Gesetze, i, pp. 155—159, § § 14 and 14, 2).

2. Stubbs, op. cit. i, 100, 439, 440, 451, note 2. There is also the port-moot or port-man-moot, the port-men, etc. These words apply to inland towns as well as to sea-ports.

3. The different causes which favoured the growth of towns can be clearly distinguished in the county of Durham. According to the Boldon-Book, this county possessed five towns at the end of the 12th century. The external conditions which had determined their development were: at Durham, the castle and the church; at Norham, the castle; at Wearmouth, the sea-port; at Darlington, the high-road; at Gateshead, the close vicinity, on the other bank of the Tyne, of the town of Newcastle, of which Gateshead was in some sort the suburb. See the article by Lapsley on the Boldon-Book, in Victoria History of Durham, i, pp. 306 sqq.

Continent, were formed in the places in which the insufficiency of agricultural life made itself felt, where the chance of leading a less laborious, more spacious, even safer life than that of the peasant offered itself.

Features of resemblance to the continental towns

In England, as elsewhere, the monastery and the castle served as nuclei of urban concentration. There as elsewhere the creation of markets attracted colonies of traders, and, thanks to the special protection of the king, the town was an abode of peace, a peace safeguarded by a doubtless rigorous penal code. There as elsewhere walls gave the citizens a security unknown to the rustic population. The Anglo-Saxon town, it is true, possesses a special franchise: it is a hundred by itself, it has its moot, its court of justice. It owes this point of superiority over the French town to the survival of the Germanic institution of the hundred among the Anglo-Saxons. But, like the towns of the Continent at the same period, it is heterogeneous, split up, and its judicial unity is interfered with by private jurisdictions; sac and soc correspond to immunity.¹ It has no corporate unity: it has indeed associations, guilds; but these are pious or charitable brotherhoods, clubs whose main business is to brew beer and drink it at the common expense;² they are not corporations taking part in the government of the town. Of merchant guilds, whose

1. Whilst attaching due importance to the interesting popular institution of the moot, we should remember that in the continental towns, justice had not entirely fallen into private hands, and that the cases of the merchants escaped the immunists. Already, in the Carolingian empire merchants were protected by the public authority, and it followed that disputes in matters of weights and measures and business transactions continued to belong to the public jurisdiction. Many merchants, moreover, were subject to no private jurisdiction, from any point of view. See Pirenne, op. cit., Revue histor., lvii, pp. 78 sqq., and pp. 86 sqq., for the importance of the jus mercatorum, [of which a useful account is given in Mitchell's Law Merchant (1904)]. Upon this last point, cf. L. Vanderkindere, La première phase de l'évolution constitutionnelle des communes flamandes, in Annales de l'Est et du Nord, année 1905, pp. 365 sqq.

2. See the article by J. H. Round on the inquest of Winchester, in Victoria History of Hampshire, i, p. 532.

interest it would be to manage common affairs, there is as yet no trace either in the documents or the Anglo-Saxon period or even in Domesday; it has been proved, moreover, that later, when there were merchant gilds, they did not constitute the kernel of municipal administration. And this is another feature common to the towns of England and those of the Continent, that the gild, while it was an element of progress and of joint defence against oppression, was not the creative element of civic self-government.¹

From what Stubbs says it is evident that we are as badly informed respecting the inner life of the primitive English towns as respecting that of the towns of the Continent.² We know nothing which allows us to assert the existence of a true municipal patriciate; there is no proof that the possessors of sac and soc, such as the lagemen of Lincoln, had administrative powers. We see clearly what the burdens weighing upon the 'burgenses' are: payment of geld and dues in kind (firma unius noctis and others) to the king, payment of gafol to the lord of the manor, military service, etc.; but we do not see what their liberties are. It is true that the description of such liberties was not one of the objects for which the Anglo-Saxon charters and Domesday Book were drawn up. It is very probable, moreover, that, as early as the eleventh century, the burgesses, emboldened by wealth and peace, had sought for safeguards against the financial tyranny of the royal officers, had dreamed of independence; they had evidently more cohesion and strength than the inhabitants of the country. They asked to be allowed to pay the sheriff an annual fixed sum, instead of numerous little imposts which made exactions easy; at Northampton the firma

1. See Gross, Gild Merchant, i, pp. 77 sqq.; Hegel, Staedte und Gilden (1891).

2. Stubbs, Const. Hist., i, p. 100 sqq.

burgi already exists at the time of Domesday. At this period, the movement of revolt against seignorial oppression has already begun in some continental towns. Everywhere the increase of moveable wealth created a powerful class of townsmen, careful to safeguard their material interests and able to enforce their claims.

It would perhaps be allowable to say that from that time forward divergences show themselves between the towns of England and those of the rest of the West. And yet, while it is true that city-republics analogous to those of Italy or Flanders are not found across the Channel, we must not think that the island was not open to continental influences. The present generation of English scholars has only quite recently set itself to determine these influences, and the results obtained have already changed all received ideas as to the development of the English towns. "Our characteristic belief that every sort of 'liberty' was born of ideas inherently English," writes one of these scholars,¹ "must receive another check, and must once more be modified to meet certain facts that have failed to obtain due recognition."

Mr. Round has shown that the maritime towns forming the confederation of the Cinque Ports had, with their mayor and their council of twelve jurats, a constitution of French origin, that they were acquainted with the essentially Flemish and Picard penalty of demolition of the offender's house,² and he thinks that the very idea of this confederation—

1. Miss Mary Bateson, The Laws of Breteuil, in English Histor. Review, xv, 1900, p. 73.

2. Mr. Round is wrong, however, in saying that this punishment existed in England only in the Cinque Ports. I find it in the Customs of Preston: "Pretor de curia colliget firmam domini regis ad quatuor terminos anni, et ibit semel propter firmam, et alia vice, si placuerit ei, deponet hostium cujuslibet burgensis, etc." (Engl. Histor. Review, xv, 1900, p. 497). Other instances have been quoted by Miss Bateson in her Borough Customs, i, pp. 30, 264, 280 and ii, pp. 38—40.

analogous to certain French collective communes and christened, moreover, by the French name of "Cinque Ports,"—was borrowed from Picardy.¹

We shall summarize and discuss further on Mr. Round's articles on the history of London; according to that scholar we have there an example of communal revolution analogous to those of France and suggested by them. Finally, a more certain fact, the Norman

1. Feudal England, pp. 552 sqq. Professor Burrows, in his Cinque Ports (Historic Towns), held that this privileged confederation was in existence before the Norman conquest. Mr. Round, op. cit., vigorously disputes this assertion. He appears to us to have proved that Edward I, in his charter of 1278, does not mention any charter of Edward the Confessor relative to the Cinque Ports. He also shows that we do not possess any royal charter granting privileges to the Cinque Ports as a body, anterior to that of 1278. He recognises that the charter of Edward I did not create the confederation, did nothing but sanction the relations already existing between the maritime towns of the south-east. But he asserts that "even so late as the days of John the Ports had individual relations with the crown, although their relations inter se were becoming of a closer character, as was illustrated by the fact that their several charters were all obtained at the same time (in 1205). Hastings alone, as yet, had rights at Yarmouth recognised: hers were the only portsmen styled "barons" by the crown." It is surprising to find a scholar like Mr. Round in error. Formal documents, which are very accessible, refute his view. I have collected, in my Etude sur la vie et le règne de Louis VIII., a fair number of documents concerning the Cinque Ports in the time of John Lackland and Henry III (see my index at the word Cinque Ports.) They prove that, not only did the Cinque Ports in the eyes of the contemporary chroniclers, of the Pope and of the legate, form an official confederation, but John and the counsellors of his infant son treated them as such, and did not reserve the name of barons to the inhabitants of Hastings alone. It will suffice to quote a letter patent of 26 May, 1216, in which John Lackland institutes Earl Warenne as warden of the Cinque Ports, whose "barons," moreover, had decided to take the side of Lewis of France: "Rex baronibus de Quinque Portibus. Quia nolumus quemquam alienigenam vobis capud vel magistrum prefici, mittimus ad vos dilectum nobis et fidelem W. comitem Warenne, consanguineum nostrum, ut presit vobis ex parte nostra ad vos custodiendum et defendendum." (Rotuli litt. Pat. i, p. 184, col. 1). Since when had this confederation existed? I do not know whether the question can ever be settled. Mr. Round recognises that the problem is difficult, and Samuel Jeake (Charters of the Cinque-Ports, 1728, p. 121) already said that the origin of the Cinque-Ports and their members was a very obscure question. We cannot, in any case, discuss it with any chance of success until all the documents bearing upon it have been got together. Works such as the book—a very artistic production it may be admitted—of Mr. F. M. Hueffer (The Cinque Ports, a historical and descriptive record, 1900) are useless to the scholar, owing to the absence of any serious study of the sources.

conquerors created towns to secure their domination, and gave these towns French customs. This very interesting discovery was made by Miss Mary Bateson.¹

It was thought until recently that the customs of Bristol had served as a model to a great number of English towns;² it was, in most of the

The diffusion of the customs of Breteuil

cases a mistake, arising from a faulty translation of the place-name Britolium.

Miss Bateson has shown that at least seventeen towns of England, Wales and Ireland, perhaps twenty-five,³ had been granted the customs and franchises of the little Norman town of Breteuil, that several of these seventeen towns—Hereford, Rhuddlan and Shrewsbury—served in their turn as models to others, had daughter towns, even grand-daughter towns. Thus Breteuil played the same part in England as Lorris or Beaumont-en-Argonne in France, or Freiburg-im-Breisgau in Germany. It was not a very ancient or very celebrated town; it first appears in history about 1060 when Duke William built a castle there; but William Fitz-Osbern, to whom the castle of Breteuil was entrusted, became one of the greatest personages of Norman England,⁴ and it is to him and his powerful family that the diffusion of the customs of Breteuil is due. This diffusion took place principally in the March of Wales, and its history shows how, by

1. 'The Laws of Breteuil,' in English Histor. Review, xv, 1900, and xvi, 1901. Aug. de Prévost, Mém pour servir à l'hist. du départ. de l'Eure, 1862, i, pp. 430 sqq., had already given useful information on this subject. See also R. Gênestal, La tenure en bourgage dans les pays régis par la coutume de Normandie, 1900, pp. 237 sqq.

2. Mr. Gross enumerates thirty-one towns "affiliated" to Bristol (Gild Merchant, i, pp. 244 sqq.); eleven only, amongst these thirty-one, were so in reality.

3. Hereford, Rhuddlan, Shrewsbury, Nether Weare, Bideford, Drogheda in Meath and Drogheda Bridge, Ludlow, Rathmore, Dungarvan, Chipping Sodbury, Lichfield, Ellesmere, Burford, Ruyton, Welshpool, Llanvyllin, Preston. The eight less certain cases are those of Stratford-on-Avon, Trim, Kells, Duleek, Old Leighlin, Cashel, Kilmacleanan, Kilmeaden.

4. Stubbs, i, p. 389.

the creation of castles and of free towns the Norman barons definitively colonised and subjected regions far from the centre of government where the pressure of the royal power was comparatively weak. The castle was generally constructed near an already existing village; the village was converted into a free town, or even in some cases a new town was built beside the village. The creation of a market, the assured custom of the garrison, the bait of the franchises of Breteuil, attracted settlers. The former inhabitants of the village continued to cultivate the land, whilst the new population, endowed with very small holdings, comprising, for example, a house and a garden, gave themselves up to industry and commerce. At times even a third element placed itself side by side with the two others; at Shrewsbury, for instance, there was a colony of French merchants, who lived apart and under a régime which had some special features. The article of the customs of Breteuil to which the burgesses attached the most value was doubtless that which reduced the maximum fine to 12 pence. It is to be found in the customs of many towns of Wales, Ireland, Devon, Cornwall, etc., which did not enjoy the rest of the franchises of Breteuil.

Thus the process of urban colonisation, employed throughout the whole extent of France by the church, the feudal baronage and the crown, employed also to civilize Germany, at first by Charlemagne, then by the emperors and princes of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was also applied in England. The "ville neuve" is to be found there¹ with franchises borrowed from a French prototype.

It cannot, however, be denied that the development of the English towns had a somewhat peculiar character,—

1. See what M. Luchaire says about the 'villes neuves': Manuel des institutions françaises, pp. 445—450.

Original features of the English towns

above all, because it was slower than on the Continent and was incomplete. The English towns never attained complete independence; during the whole of the Middle Ages they remained rather small urban groups. Must we conclude from this that the Anglo-Saxon genius was ill-adapted for city life, and was only at its ease in the organization of the village and the agricultural group? ¹ We will not invoke the "genius of the race;" it is better to explain this fact by the economic conditions peculiar to mediæval England and by the extraordinary power of its monarchy.²

1. This is what Mr. Round says in a passage which, however, is concerned only with the Anglo-Saxon period (Commune of London, 1899, p. 221.)

2. It will suffice to recall the case of the most important of English towns, London, whose mediocre liberties were unceasingly at the mercy of the kings. See below.

NOTE BY EDITOR.—Since this chapter was written a valuable survey of recent investigations into the origin of English municipal institutions has been contributed by Mr. H. W. C. Davis to the Quarterly Review, Jan., 1908 (vol. ccviii, p. 54).

IX.

LONDON IN THE TWELFTH CENTURY.

ACCORDING to Stubbs,¹ the charter of Henry I., granted to the Londoners in the first years of the twelfth century² profoundly altered the organisation of London. The "complex system of gild and franchise" gave place to the system of the county; the city became a county in itself, and the county of Middlesex, in which it lay, was let at farm to the Londoners by Henry I.; henceforth London had its own sheriff. But Henry I.'s favours were ephemeral; the Pipe Roll of 1130 bears witness to it. The suppression of such precious privileges, the disappearance of the port-reeve, the conversion of the cnihten-gild into a religious house, "signify, perhaps, a municipal revolution the history of which is lost."

Such a statement of the facts treats the searching studies of Mr. Round as if they had never been.³

It is to them that, pending the appearance of a good history of London, which does not yet exist,⁴ we must

1. Const. Hist., i, p. 439 sqq.; 673 sqq.

2. Ibid., p. 674.

3. The early administration of London, in Geoffrey de Manderville (1892), "Appendix P," pp. 347—373;—London under Stephen, in The Commune of London (1899), pp. 97—124. Stubbs quotes (p. 440, note 1) the first of these two articles for a detail concerning a misreading of the charter of Henry I, and he adds that "the whole history of London at this period is treated there," but in spite of this admission, he has not rectified his certainly erroneous interpretation of the charter of Henry I.

4. We await with impatience the volumes dealing with London, which are to form a special series in the Victoria History of the counties. Quite recently there has appeared the first volume of a description of London in the Middle Ages by Sir Walter Besant (Mediæval London, 1906, i). There is scarcely a mention in this first volume of the municipal institutions which are to be studied in vol. ii. Sir Walter Besant's work is unprovided with any notes or apparatus criticus.

look for an exact and intelligible interpretation of the charter of Henry I.

"Sciatis me concessisse civibus meis Londoniarum tenendum Middlesex ad firmam pro ccc libris ad compotum, ipsis et haeredibus suis, de me et haeredibus meis, ita quod ipsi cives ponent vicecomitem qualem voluerint de se ipsis."¹

Several scholars, notably Freeman,—Stubbs has not taken sides clearly on this point—have thought that by this clause Henry I. gave Middlesex in some sort to the Londoners, made of it a district subject to London, in its fiscal relations. Mr. Round has shown, that Middlesex here signifies London and Middlesex which surrounds it, that London and Middlesex formed but a single unit for the farm of taxation, and that this state of things, far from having been created by the charter of Henry I., existed long before. It was natural, indeed, that the smallest of the English counties should form one body with the greatest of English towns, which it contained. It is also a mistake to believe that the office of sheriff was created by the charter of Henry. The sheriff (shire-reeve) existed before, but, as here the town (port) was more important than the county (shire), that officer was called the port-reeve and not the shire-reeve. The vicecomes is no other than the port-reeve of London, who was, perhaps, called shire-reeve, sheriff when dealing with the affairs of Middlesex. The title of port-reeve disappeared in the 12th century, but not the office.²

Henry I., then, neither constituted London a county, Real object of nor subjected Middlesex to London, nor the Charter created the office of sheriff of London.³

1. Select Charters, p. 108.

2. As for the "conversion of the cnihten-gild into a religious house" accepted by Stubbs, Coote, and Loftie, it is, Mr. Round has shown, pure imagination.

3. Was the office of justiciar of London, on the contrary, a novelty? Henry I. says in his charter: "... ipsi cives ponent . . . justitiarium qualem voluerint de seipsis, ad custodiendum placita coronae meae et eadem placitanda, et nullus alius erit justitiarius super ipsos homines

But the Londoners, who had evidently suffered from the exactions of the royal sheriffs, by the charter in question obtained the entire disposal of the office, in other words they paid the farm of the City and of Middlesex to the king themselves.

In addition, the farm, which Henry I. had increased to £500, was brought down to the previous figure of £300.

There is nothing to compel us to believe that the charter of Henry I., whose date is unknown, is earlier than the Pipe Roll of 1130, which bears No corporate unity witness to an organisation much less advantageous to the citizens; it was this unfavourable organisation that, in all probability, the charter granted by Henry remedied. But there was still nothing, it seems, in the capital, which resembled a municipality;¹ as Stubbs says, London was nothing but an "assemblage of little communities, manors, parishes, ecclesias-

Londoniarum." Mr. Round asserts that this office, which arose from a dismemberment of the sherifffdom, was, as far as London is concerned, created by the charter of Henry I (Geoffrey de Mandeville, pp. 106 sqq. and Append. P, p. 373). Nevertheless Mr. Round has himself republished a charter of 1141, in which King Stephen confers on Geoffrey de Mandeville "justicias et vicecomitatum de Londonia et de Middlesexa in feodo et hereditate eadem firma qua Gaufridus de Mannavilla avus suus eas tenuit, scilicet pro CCC libris" (Ibidem, pp. 141-142). The office existed, therefore, at the end of the preceding century (cf. ibidem, p. 373), unless we assume that the charter of 1141 mentions separately two offices which were still united in one in the time of Geoffrey de Mandeville the grandfather. We should like, however, to draw attention to the fact that this is pure hypothesis, and that there is nothing in the charter of Henry I to show that the office was a new one. This office is several times mentioned in the collection of London municipal documents, contained in the Additional MS. 14, 252, which Miss Bateson has analysed in the English Historical Review. Unfortunately, these documents are for the most part undated. The justiciar is there called justicia in Latin, justise in French. (English Historical Review, xvii, 1902, pp. 707, 711.)

1. Dr. Liebermann has, indeed, drawn attention to a phrase in the little tract entitled De injusta vexatione Willelmi Dunelmensis, of which Stubbs had occasion to make use for another purpose (See Stubbs, i, p. 476). We find mention there of the "meliores duodecim cives" of London, and it may be asked whether there is not a reference here to a body of twelve notables governing London as early as the end of the 11th century (Cf. Mary Bateson, in English Historical Review, xvii, 1902, p. 730, note 105.)

tical jurisdictions and gilds," and each of these organisms had a life of its own. The corporate unity of London was prepared for only by some common institutions: I mean the financial system of the royal farm, the folk moot,—an assembly of little importance which had met from time immemorial,—and above all the weekly court of Danish origin, the husting. The misfortunes and anarchy of Stephen's reign showed the value and necessity of this corporate unity, without however bringing about its definitive realisation.

The Londoners, who had taken part in the election of Stephen, and who, during the disorder of the civil war, saw the monarchical power dissolve and the king's peace disappear, were too proud, too careful for the security of their persons and their property, not to aspire to the unity alone capable of securing their independence and rendering them redoubtable. They were in constant relations with the communities of the Continent. The idea came quite naturally to them of imitating these. It appears that in 1141, the year in which they made a conspiratio to drive out the Empress Matilda, they formed a sort of sworn commune; William of Malmesbury speaks of a communio and says that barons had been received into this association.¹

There would seem, then, to have been a revolutionary movement in London analogous to those which agitated certain towns of the Continent. But it very often happened that the leagues formed under oath, in French or German towns had no lasting result.²

1. "Feria quarta venerunt Londonienses, et, in concilium introducti, causam suam eatenus egerunt ut dicerent missos se a communione quam vocant Londoniarum, non certamina sed preces offere, ut dominus suus rex de captione liberaretur. Hoc omnes barones, qui in eorum communionem jamdudum recepti fuerant, summopere flagitare a domino legato." (Will of Malmesbury, Hist. Novella, Ed. Stubbs, ii, p. 576.) Cf. the account given by Stubbs, Const. Hist., i, p. 442.

2. For example, the league formed in 958 by the people of Cambray to prevent their bishop from returning to their town: "Cives Cameraci male consulti conspirationem multo tempore susurratam et diu desideratam

This was what took place in the case of the "communio" of 1141, whatever may have been its precise character.

Far from granting new privileges to the Londoners, who had just rendered him a splendid service, Stephen was, in fact, obliged by circumstances to favour the powerful Geoffrey de Mandeville at their expense, and to take from them even the advantages which had been granted to them by Henry I., or at least those which they valued most. As early as Christmas of this same year 1141, the offices of sheriff and justiciar of London were conferred on or rather restored by Stephen to, the house of Mandeville, which had already enjoyed them, at the end of the preceding century, in return for a farm of £300.¹

In the reign of Henry II., the sheriffs of London and of Middlesex are named by the king, and the farm rises to the figure of £500 or even more. The office of justiciar, doubtless incompatible with the circuits of the itinerant justices, disappears. The charter of 1155 marks a reaction from the charter of Henry I. The reign of the most powerful sovereign, of the most despotic statesman perhaps who had yet governed the English had just begun, and the son of Matilda could not easily pardon the Londoners either for the support they had given Stephen against the empress, or for their aspirations to independence.

juraverunt communiam. Adeo sunt inter se sacramento conjuncti, quod nisi factam concederet conjurationem, denegarent universi introitum Cameraci reversuro pontifici." This phrase of the Gesta episcoporum Cameracensium (Monum. Germ. SS. vii, p. 498) recalls the communio and the conspiratio of London in 1141. But it proves (nisi factam concederet conjurationem) that the Cambresians demanded liberties, while we know absolutely nothing of the end aimed at by the communio of the Londoners, and their conspiratio of the month of June 1141 seems to have had for its sole object the expulsion of Matilda.

1. Sir Walter Besant does not seem to have been acquainted with this charter of Stephen in favour of the Mandevilles. (Cf. Medieval London, i, p. 4.)

Exactly half-a-century after the episode of 1141, when Henry II. was dead, when Richard was fighting in the Holy Land, and civil troubles were beginning again in England, the Londoners took advantage of the conflict between William Longchamp and John Lackland to renew the attempt to establish a commune. This time, they succeeded, and John took an oath to the communa of London on the 8th of October.¹ It was a real commune, a "seigneurie collective populaire" in the French fashion. The famous invective of Richard of Devizes proves this fact very clearly.² The commune of London doubtless organised itself immediately. In any case,—we learn this from a text which Dr. Liebermann had pointed out and Mr. Round first made full use of,—as early as 1193, it had a mayor. At that date, indeed, the members of the commune of London swear to remain faithful to Richard, who is a prisoner in Germany; they swear also to adhere to the commune, and obey the mayor of the city of London and the skivini (échevins) of the commune, and give consideration to the mayor and skivini and other probi homines who shall be with them.³

The commune
of 1191

The mayor of London

Stubbs, who was not acquainted with this document,

1. See the very brief account in Stubbs, i, p. 673.

2. "Concessa est ipsa die et instituta communia Londoniensium, in quam universi regni magnates et ipsi etiam ipsius provinciae episcopi jurare coguntur. Nunc primum in indulta sibi conjuratione regno regem deesse cognovit Londonia, quam nec rex ipse Ricardus, nec praedecessor et pater ejus Henricus pro mille millibus marcarum argenti fieri permisisset. Quanta quippe mala ex conjuratione proveniant ex ipsa poterit diffinitione perpendi, quae talis est: communia est tumor plebis, timor regni, tepor sacerdotii" (Ed. Howlett in Chronicles of the reigns of Stephen, etc. (Rolls Ser.), iii, p. 416.)

3. "Sacramentum commune tempore regis Ricardi quando detentus erat Alemaniam (sic).—Quod fidem portabunt domino regi Ricardo de vita sua et de membris et de terreno honore suo contra omnes homines et feminas qui vivere possunt aut mori et quod pacem suam servabunt et adjuvabunt servare, et quod communam tenebunt et obedientes erunt maiori civitatis Lond[onie] et skivin[is] ejusdem commune in fide regis et quod sequentur et tenebunt considerationem maioris et skivinatorum et aliorum proborum hominum qui cum illis erunt salvo honore Dei et sancte Ecclesie et fide domini regis Ricardi et salvis per omnia libertatibus civitatis Lond[onie].” (Round, Commune of London, pp. 235–236.)

had divined the character of the revolution of 1191. He notes the French origin of the office of mayor, and of the commune. He only touches lightly on the question in his Constitutional History. But, in one of the substantial notices with which he has accompanied his Select Charters, he writes: "The mayoralty of London dates from the earliest years of Richard I., probably from the foundation of that communa which was confirmed on the occasion of William Longchamp's downfall. The name of that officer, as well as that of the communa itself, is French. That the incorporation under this form was held to imply very considerable municipal independence may be inferred from the fact that one of the charges brought by William Fitz-Osbert against Richard Fitz-Osbert, was that he had not forbidden the saying: quodcunque eat vel veniat quod nunquam habeant Londonienses alium regem quam majorem Londoniarum."¹

The influence of French institutions on the establishment of this commune of London is not matter of doubt, any more than is the high degree of independence to which the citizens laid claim. It is more than probable that they had chosen their mayor themselves. But what are the skivini and probi homines who appear in the oath of the commune in 1193? The mention which is made of them has suggested to Mr. Round a very ingenious hypothesis. It is that the constitution of London was modelled upon the Établissements of Rouen² and that London, like Rouen, had a council of twelve skivini and twelve other persons (the duodecim consultores of Rouen, the alii probi homines of the oath of 1193), to administer justice. And, in fact, adds Mr. Round, we have the text of an oath sworn to King John in 1205—1206 by twenty-four persons charged with the administration of justice in London; these twenty-four are not the aldermen, who are simply heads of wards. The twenty-four can only have been councillors elected by the mass of the burgesses.

1. Select Charters, 8th edition, p. 308.

2. Mr. Round makes a correction of M. Giry's book on the Établissements of Rouen and proves that they are anterior to the year 1183 (Commune of London, pp. 247—251.)

And of
Mr. Adams Mr. G. B. Adams has sought to complete and follow up Mr. Round's hypothesis.¹

According to him, the commune created in 1191 was a commune in the technical sense, a "seigneurie collective," a vassal of the king, like the great French communes. King Richard did not allow London thus to quit his demesne, and by becoming his vassal escape the domanial claims and took this privilege away from it as soon as he returned, whilst leaving it its mayor and its skivini. London thus ceases to be a commune until the day when John is forced to seek its support. By article 12 of the Great Charter he formally recognises the feudal character of the city, for he admits that it owes to him the auxilium, that is to say the feudal aid, the aid of the nobles. A document of the reign of Henry III. shows, in fact, that London claimed only to give the king an aid, and refuse to pay the tallage;² this pretension was however rejected by the counsellors of Henry III. London did not succeed in obtaining a lasting recognition of its legal right to a commune.

We cannot subscribe wholly to either the theory of Mr. Round or that of Mr. Adams. Miss Mary Bateson has studied from beginning to end the collection of municipal documents in which Mr. Round found the oath of 1193, and has discovered in it texts which render untenable

No filiation with Rouen

1. London and the Commune, in English Historical Review, xix, 1904, pp. 702 sqq.

2. Mr. Adams contents himself with analysing this important text. There is some advantage in reading it in extenso; it is printed by Madox, Exchequer, i, p. 712, note a (edition of 1769). See the abstract and fragments of it we give below.

the hypothesis of a filiation between London and Rouen.¹ We see, in fact, there that the aldermen sat in the husting, that they declared the law there,² and beyond doubt the twenty-four who are mentioned in the text of 1205-6 are aldermen, and not a self-styled council of twelve skivini and twelve probi homines. For the rest, it is quite likely that the skivini mentioned in the text of 1193—without their number being specified—are simply the twenty-four aldermen; skivini was an exotic term which a scribe may have used to designate the aldermen; and it is remarkable that it is not found afterwards, in any text relating to London. As for the probi homines—whose number Mr. Round, with no more reason than in the case of the skivini, fixes at twelve,—they were, in the most vague and general sense, notables, who advised and aided the mayor, and on occasion this term doubtless served to denote the aldermen themselves. There were probi homines sitting in the husting,³ and it is not surprising that the burgesses, in 1193, swear to respect them; it is noticeable, moreover, that they do not swear to obey them.⁴

We shall only, therefore, admit that London formed itself into a commune in 1191, and that it had—immediately doubtless—a mayor. We Richard certainly did not recognise the commune shall also admit with Mr. Round and Mr. Adams that Richard Cœur-de-Lion suppressed the commune (or at least that he took no account of the oath of 1191), while

1. Mary Bateson, A London Municipal Collection of the reign of John, in English Historical Review, xvii, 1902, pp. 480 sqq., 707 sqq.

2. "E les aldremans dirunt si le rei deit avoir le plai u le vescuente . . . Les aldremans en durunt dreit." (Ibidem, p. 493.)

3. ". . . Dunc deit le vescuente prendre quatre prudomes dedenz les quatre bancs del husteng . . ." (Ibidem, p. 493.) Respecting these "quatre bancs," see Mary Bateson, Borough Customs, ii, 1906, p. cxlvii.

4. Eng. Hist. Rev., xvii, pp. 510-511. On pages 727-728 of the same volume Miss Bateson prints a text which fully confirms her view "Item de omni redditu forinsecorum capiatur de singulis libris xiiid. exceptis redditibus ecclesiasticis. Item ad hanc pecuniam colligendam et recipiendam eligantur iiii probi ac discreti homines de qualibet custodia." Probi homines is used in no more technical or precise sense than discreti homines.

maintaining a mayor, who kept his office for life. John Lackland, indeed at his accession, granted to the Londoners their old privilege of holding the sheriffdom of London and Middlesex, for a farm of 300 pounds; this privilege for which the Londoners paid King John a sum of 3,000 marks, they would have had no need to buy if they had been at that time an independent commune, protected, by the liberties it had won, against the royal sheriffs and the financial pressure of the crown. Moreover, in the three charters granted to the Londoners at this period there is no mention made of the commune.

Was the commune of London restored afterwards by John Lackland, when he had need of the support of the inhabitants? Such is, we have seen, the opinion of Mr. Adams based on article 12 of the Great Charter and a document of the time of Henry III. Mr. MacKechnie, for his part, is of opinion that the charter of the 9th May, 1215, granting to the Londoners the right of electing their mayor annually, is an official recognition of the commune.¹ Let us look at these documents more closely, and, if possible, throw light on them by others.

Miss Bateson discovered a list of nine articles, which seems to be a summary of a petition presented by the Londoners before the granting of the charter of the 9th of May, 1215; the annual mayoralty is mentioned.² There is no mention of a commune; no mention is made of it either in the charter of the 9th of May. By this last document,³ John only grants to his "barons" of the city of London the right to elect every year from their own number a mayor "faithful to the

1. "The charter of May, 1215, by officially recognizing the mayor, placed the commune over which he presided on a legal footing. The revolutionary civic constitution, sworn to in 1191, was now confirmed." (MacKechnie, Magna Carta, 1905, p. 289.)

2. "De majore habendo, de anno in annum, per folkesmot, et quod primum juret." (English Histor. Review, xvii, 1902, p. 726; art 7).

3. Select Charters, pp. 314-315 (8th edition).

king, discreet and suitable for the government of the city" who is to be "presented" to the king, or, in his absence, to the justiciar, and swear fealty to him. At the end of a year the Londoners might keep the same mayor, or change him. The liberties of London are confirmed in vague terms.¹ Unquestionably the right of electing the mayor annually was extremely important, and this right was actually exercised by the Londoners. But it cannot be claimed that it was sufficient to constitute a commune in the French sense of the word.

As for article 12 of the Great Charter, it is obscure and we may be allowed to quote it in its exact form :

London and the Great
Charter

"Nullum scutagium vel auxilium ponatur in regno nostro, nisi per commune consilium regni nostri, nisi ad corpus nostrum redimendum, et primogenitum filium nostrum militem faciendum, et ad filiam nostram primogenitam semel maritandam, et ad hec non fiat nisi rationabile auxilium; simili modo fiat de auxiliis de civitate London."

Article 13 goes on :² "Et civitas London. habeat omnes antiquas libertates et liberas consuetudines suas, tam per terras quam per aquas. Preterea volumus et concedimus quod omnes alie civitates et burghi et ville et portus habeant omnes libertates et liberas consuetudines suas."³

By article 12, John Lackland pledges himself not to levy any scutage or aid beyond the three occasions provided for by feudal law, without the consent of the assembly of tenants-in-chief, and the aid in these three cases is to be levied on a reasonable scale. But what does the

1. "Concessimus etiam eisdem baronibus nostris et carta nostra confirmavimus quod habeant bene et in pace, libere, quiete et integre, omnes libertates suas quibus hactenus usi sunt, tam in civitate Londoniarum quam extra, et tam in aquis quam in terris, et omnibus aliis locis, salva nobis chamberlengeria nostra." These last words signify that the purveyors of the king's household shall have the right of making their choice, first of all, from the goods brought in by foreign merchants.

2. It is not without interest to remember that this division into articles does not exist in the original.

3. Bémont, Chartes des Libertés Anglaises, p. 29.

obscure phrase relative to the aids of the city of London mean? Must we conclude from it with Mr. Adams that John Lackland identified the aids of London with the feudal aids, and thus recognised its character of a "seigneurie collective populaire?"

We do not think so. In order to understand this phrase we must go back to article 32 of the Articuli

London and the Petition of the Barons

Baronum, a petition presented by the barons to John Lackland some days before the granting of the Great Charter: "Ne scutagium vel auxilium ponatur in regno, nisi per commune consilium regni, nisi ad corpus regis redimendum, et primogenitum filium suum militem faciendum, et filiam suam primogenitam semel maritandam; et ad hoc fiat rationabile auxilium. Simili modo fiat de taillagiis et auxiliis de civitate London. et de aliis civitatibus que inde habent libertates, et ut civitas London. plene habeat antiquas libertates et liberas consuetudines suas tam per aquas, quam per terras."¹

Mr. Adams declares that this article of the petition of the barons was badly drafted, whilst the corresponding article of the Great Charter was drafted with care. We believe, on the contrary, that the article of the petition

What the Londoners
wanted

of the barons alone represents the precise wishes of the Londoners. They desired a guarantee against royal arbitrariness, and did not wish any longer to have to pay ruinous taxes, either in the form of tallage or in the form of aids,—an extremely elastic term, which had very diverse meanings and was in no wise reserved for the feudal aid.²

1. Bémont, op. cit., p. 19.

2. The author of the Dialogue concerning the Exchequer, ii, c. xiii (Edition of Hughes, Crump and Johnson, p. 145), speaks formally of the donum or auxilium of the towns: "de auxiliis vel donis civitatum seu burgorum." And, in fact, in the first half of the 12th century, when the Danegeld was still collected, the sum furnished by Middlesex was paid under the name of Danegeld, that paid by London was paid under the name of donum or auxilium. See on this point Round, Commune of London, pp. 257 sqq. We may read in Stubbs (i, p. 620, note 2), a writ of 1207, in which John demands an auxilium from the archdeacons

The tallage was the tax which bore upon the inhabitants of the royal demesne, and the towns possessing a royal charter were considered as forming part of the demesne. The aid was in theory a gift made to the king, and the townsmen did not escape from the ill-defined obligation to this gratuity, any more than the clergy or the nobility. The Londoners feared the tallage even more than the aid.¹ A text to which attention has never been paid until now proves this. In this list of nine articles, of which I was speaking just now, I read as follows: "De omnibus tallagiis delendis nisi per communem assensum regni et civitatis." Thus, before obtaining their private charter of the 9th of May, the Londoners already demanded that they might not be subjected to the tallage without the consent of the regnum, that is to say, evidently, the assembly of the tenants-in-chief. The silence of the charter of the 9th of May proves that John did not wish to give up any part of his prerogative upon this point. The following month the barons, who had great obligations towards the townsmen of the realm, and particularly towards the Londoners, included in their petition article 32, which secured London and the towns having the same liberties as London against the abuses of zeal for the interests of the royal treasury,—in so far as the consent of an assembly of barons could be a security. Comparison of the petition of the barons and the Great Charter shows that in this question, as in many others, John Lackland exacted a compromise.² He refused to put any other town in the position of London, and even to London he only granted a derisive satisfaction. The concession

John's illusory

of the realm, and expresses the desire that the rest of the clergy may be influenced by the example of the archdeacons to pay an auxilium also. The word was therefore used in a very wide sense. Cf. Stubbs, i, pp. 626—628.

1. They had just paid, in the year 1214—15, a tallage of 2,000 marks: "Anna ejusdem Johannis sextodecimo, talliati fuerunt predicti cives Londoniæ ad duo millia marcarum." (Madox, Hist of Exchequer, i, p. 712, note a.)

2. This is well put by Mr. MacKechnie, Magna Carta, pp. 277 sqq.

suppression of the words de taillagiis allowed him to tallage the Londoners at his pleasure; on these conditions he could do without their auxilia. Such, in our opinion, is the true explanation of article 12 of the Great Charter.

The argument which Mr. Adams draws from the text published by Madox is more specious. It may be asked

Why London claimed exemption
from tallage

why the Londoners were so particular about paying an auxilium and not a tallagium.¹ But the context supplies a very simple answer to this question.

Henry III. levies a tallage of three thousand marks on the Londoners. They refuse to pay it and offer an aid of two thousand marks.² They are told that they may pay, if they wish, a composition of three thousand marks in place of the tallage,³ but if they refuse the tallage shall be assessed on the town in the form of a capitation. The Londoners still resist, and then arises the dispute over the use of the word tallagium; the inquest proves the baselessness of their pretension, they recognise themselves as tallageable and pay the three thousand marks. For them it was clearly a question of not paying in its entirety the large sum demanded by the king, and, as they knew well that they could not discuss the amount of a tallage, they had hit on this expedient of saying that they were not tallageable, and of offering an "aid" of two thousand marks only. For an aid is, professedly, a voluntary gift to the sovereign, and it is recognised by the king's officers that the assessment

1. "Et cum contencio esset, utrum hoc dici deberet tallagium vel auxilium, rex scrutari fecit rotulos suos, utrum ipsi aliquid dederunt regi vel antecessoribus suis nomine tallagii. . . ." An inquest proved that the Londoners had paid a tallage of 2,000 marks in 1214-1215, and several tallages in the reign of Henry III. "Postea in crastino . . . venerunt praedicti Radulfus major et cives et recognoverunt se esse talliabiles." (Madox, op. cit. i, p. 712, note a.)

2. "Rex petebat ab eis tria millia marcarum nomine tallagii, et illi . . . optulerunt regi duo millia marcarum nomine auxilii, et dixerunt praecise quod plus non poterunt dare nec darent."

3. Finem trium millium marcarum pro tallagio."

cannot be left to his arbitrary discretion.¹ The king was not particular about the name provided he had the thing, and he offered to abandon the tallage if they would pay him its equivalent; as the Londoners did not comply and haggled over the terms, he forced them to recognise that they were tallageable. They never dreamed of asserting that they constituted a commune and that because of this they owed nothing but a feudal aid; there is nothing of the kind in the text, and Mr. Adams's argument will not hold water.

Not only was the "Commune of London" not recognised by John Lackland, but the burgesses did not even show any desire for such recognition. London did not demand the recognition of the commune They asked for nothing of the sort in the nine articles, or in the petition of the barons. I will add that such a claim is equally absent from their demands, some months later, when Lewis of France, son of Philip Augustus, landed in England, and this fact appears to me decisive. The Londoners were the most faithful allies of Lewis, his allies from first to last. The pretender could have refused them nothing. Now, there is no question of the recognition of the commune either in the engagements he entered into with them on his arrival nor in the negotiations and stipulations of the peace which preceded his definitive departure.²

1. In a very interesting passage, which Mr. Adams has not had present in his memory, the author of the Dialogue concerning the Exchequer (Bk. ii, c. xiii, Edn. of Hughes, Crump and Johnson, p. 145) discusses the case in which the donum vel auxilium of the towns was imposed by the officers of the king in the form of a capitation (observe that this is the procedure with which Henry III. threatens the Londoners, if they do not give way), and the case in which it consists of a round sum, offered by the burgesses, and accepted as "principe digna." In the eyes of the author of the Dialogue, there is no reason for reserving for this offer "worthy of the prince" the name of auxilium, and calling tallagium only the tax imposed in the form of a capitation. In the thirteenth century, men become more subtle, the burgesses try to make distinctions to their profit; but they have no idea of claiming that London ought to be treated as a feudal person, nor do they invoke article 12 of the Great Charter to prove it.

2. See my Etude sur la vie et le règne de Louis VIII., especially pp. 102 and 160 (Cf. the word Londres in the index). According to the

We must neither exaggerate or depreciate the status of London at this period. The city was not a commune in the French sense of the word; it had only been so for a very brief space, during the absence of Richard Cœur de Lion. It was not bound to the king by that mutual oath which, according to the historians was characteristic of the French seigneurie collective populaire: this bilateral oath had only been taken in 1191, and since the return of Richard Cœur-de-Lion there had been no longer question of anything but the oath taken by the burgesses or their mayor. The city had not, in the matter of finance and justice, the independence of the popular republics of the Continent.¹ Nevertheless it was very powerful, and rival parties disputed its alliance. Its inhabitants were "barons." Londonienses, qui sunt quasi optimates, pro magnitudine civitatis, said William of Malmesbury, who wrote in the time of King Stephen; since that time, thanks to the difficulties of the reign of Richard I. and the crisis of 1215, London had gradually gained one of the principal municipal liberties, that of having an annually elected mayor. And perhaps, after all, it is puerile to investigate whether London in 1215 was or was not a commune; the Londoners of that day did not trouble themselves about it; and without doubt we attach too much importance to words which we have made technical terms for the convenience of our historical studies.

account of several chroniclers, Lewis, on his arrival, 3 June, 1216, received the 'homage' of the citizens, and in return promised to give back to the Londoners good laws: "Juravit quod singulis eorum bonas leges redderet, simul et amissas hereditates." But the reference here is only to the mutual pledge quite natural under the circumstances, and not to the oath of the commune. See the passages quoted ibidem, p. 102, note 2.

1. Four times at least in eleven years, Henry III. seized the town of London into his hands, notably for false judgement in the husting (Pollock and Maitland, Hist. of English Law, i, p. 668.)

X.

THE TWO TRIALS OF JOHN LACKLAND.

ACCORDING to the narrative of Stubbs, John Lackland was twice condemned as contumacious by the court of Philip Augustus—in 1202 and in 1203.

Narrative of
Stubbs

After his first condemnation, in 1202, his nephew Arthur, "taking advantage of the confusion, raised a force and besieged his grandmother in the castle of Mirabel, where he was captured by John, and, after some mysterious transactions, he disappeared finally on the 3rd of April, 1203. Philip, who believed with the rest of the world that John had murdered him, summoned him again to be tried on the accusation made by the barons of Brittany. Again John was contumacious, and this time Philip himself undertook to enforce the sentence of the court" and conquered Normandy.¹ It is singular that so careful a scholar as Stubbs should have summarised these celebrated events with so much negligence;² it is still more surprising that he took no account, in the successive editions of his book, of the opinion accepted and expressed, for a score of years, by all the

1. Const. Hist., i, p. 556.

2. To speak only of quite well known and indisputable facts. Stubbs appears not to know that, as early as the month of June 1202, long before the death of Arthur, and in execution of the first sentence of the court of France, Philip-Augustus had taken up arms and invaded Normandy. If he had narrated these events with more exactitude he would, no doubt, have been led to see the improbability of the view that there were two condemnations, which M. Bémont has so thoroughly refuted. In the otherwise very remarkable preface, written for his edition of the Historical collections of Walter of Coventry (Rolls Series; ii, p. xxxii, note 3) he only noted that the earliest mention of the condemnation of 1203 was to be found in the manifesto launched by Lewis of France in 1216.

French, German and English scholars, with one exception, who have given their opinion on the alleged trial of April, 1203. M. Bémont demonstrated in 1884, by the most cogent arguments, that the condemnation of John Lackland in 1203 for the murder of Arthur was a fable, invented by the court of France in 1216, in order to justify the pretensions of Lewis of France to the crown of England.¹ The attempt made in 1899 by M. Guilhiermoz to refute the thesis of M. Bémont has not met with acceptance.² We have examined and contested it on a previous occasion. We will content ourselves with quoting the views of two scholars who

The now accepted opinion upon the second trial

1. De Johanne cognomine sine Terra Angliae rege Lutetiae Parisiorum anno 1202 condemnato, 1884; French edition: De la Condamnation de Jean sans Terre par la cour des pairs de France en 1202 in the Revue Historique, xxxii, 1886. Cf. Ch. Petit-Dutaillis, Etude sur la vie et le règne de Louis VIII, 1894, pp. 77 sqq. M. Guilhiermoz remarks that the conclusions of M. Bémont "appear to have been universally accepted," and he quotes MM. Ch. V. Langlois, Beautemps-Beaupré, Luchaire, Lot, etc.

2. Guilhiermoz, Les deux condamnations de Jean sans Terre par la cour de Philippe-Auguste, in Bibl. de l'Ecole des Chartes, 1899. Cf. his controversy with M. Bémont in the same volume, and with MM. Petit-Dutaillis and G. Monod, in Rev. Historique, lxxi and lxxii (1899—1900), and a new article by him in the Nouv. Rev. hist. de droit français et étranger (1904), p. 786 sqq. I am bound to say that on a reperusal of the article in which I refuted M. Guilhiermoz's thesis, my only regret is that I did not put my conclusion more strongly. For the rest, M. Guilhiermoz has found no supporters. See a luminous summary of the question by M. Luchaire, Séances et Travaux de l'Acad. des Sc. Morales, liii, 1900; F. Lot, Fidèles ou vassaux (1904), pp. 89, note 3, 223 sqq.; R. Holtzmann, Der Prozess gegen Johann ohne Land und die Anfänge des französischen Pairhofes, in the Historische Zeitschrift, Neue Folge, lix. (1905). M. J. Lehmann, Johann ohne Land, in the Historische Studien published by E. Ebering, Pt. 45, 1904, goes beyond M. Bémont's thesis and puts forth the singular view that the documents of 1216, in which the trial of 1203 is referred to, are not authentic. I am only acquainted with the summary of this article given by M. Holtzmann, op. cit., p. 32, n. 3. In England, Sir James Ramsay (The Angevin Empire, 1903, pp. 393 and 397) does not believe in the condemnation of 1203; but he thinks there was a citation; he interprets the documents quite wrongly and obscures the question instead of throwing light on it. An American scholar, Mr. G. B. Adams, entrusted with the treatment of this period in the Political History of England (ii, 1905), declares, p. 399, that he is not convinced by M. Guilhiermoz. So, too, Miss Kate Norgate in the article referred to below, and in her John Lackland (1902), pp. 91—92; as we shall see, Miss Norgate goes farther than M. Bémont, and assuredly much too far.

not having been brought into the controversy by M. Guilhiermoz, have expressed an opinion the impartiality of which no one will dispute. M. Luchaire declares that "he adheres until further proof is forthcoming to the conclusions of M. Bémont;" quite recently M. Holtzmann stated that the vehement polemic of M. Guilhiermoz has made no impression; it appears to him to be based rather on "a lawyer's argument than on a critical examination of the sources."

In a work devoted to English institutions I cannot dwell any longer on this point, and Stubbs' excuse is just this, that it is a matter of little importance for the subject of which he is treating whether M. Bémont is right or wrong as far as concerns the reality of the second trial of John Lackland.

· But it is important to know whether M. Bémont was right in believing in the reality of the first trial; the loss of Normandy had such consequences in the constitutional history of England that it is a matter of interest, even here, to determine whether it was the result of a sentence of the court of France. The publication of M. Bémont's article did not affect the belief that Normandy was confiscated by legal process; only the date or dates of the confiscation were matters of controversy. But a new theory has grafted itself on that of M. Bémont. According to an article published in 1900 by Miss Kate Norgate¹ John Lackland was no more condemned by the court of Philip Augustus for refusing to redress the wrongs he had inflicted on the Poitevin barons, than for having put to death his nephew Arthur, and the "alleged condemnation" of 1202 was invented in 1204-5 by Philip Augustus, in order to overcome the scruples of the Norman clergy and justify the conquest of

Miss Kate
Norgate's theory respecting the first trial

1. The alleged condemnation of King John by the Court of France in 1202, in Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, New series, xiv, 1900, pp. 53-67.

Normandy. It seems to me expedient to examine this theory closely.

Miss Norgate's argument is as follows. Five contemporary documents narrate the citation of John Lackland before the court of France in 1202: the French chronicles of Rigord and Guillaume le Breton, the English chronicles of Gervase of Canterbury and Ralph of Coggeshall, and finally a letter addressed by Pope Innocent III. to John Lackland on the 31st of October, 1203. Roger of Wendover does not speak of the citation at all.¹ And the later chroniclers who accepted the discredited trial of 1203, are silent as to that of 1202. The five documents mentioned above supplement one another and present no contradiction amongst themselves, as far as concerns the citation, and the relations of the two kings before the trial; but Ralph of Coggeshall alone declares that John Lackland was condemned by default,² and the alleged sentence of 1202 rests in reality on his single testimony. It is improbable that this abbot of an obscure monastery in Essex was better informed than Gervase of Canterbury, Rigord, Guillaume le

1. I do not quite understand why Miss Norgate limits her study to six documents in all, including Roger of Wendover. Robert of Auxerre is a contemporary of the events and his testimony has great value; he does not speak of a citation either, but he says nothing to prevent us from believing in one. See the passage in Historiens de France, xviii, p. 266.

2. "Tandem vero curia regis Franciae adunata adjudicavit regem Angliae tota terra sua privandum, quam hactenus de regibus Franciae ipse et progenitores sui tenuerant, eo quod fere omnia servitia eisdem terris debita per longum jam tempus facere contempserant, nec domino suo fere in aliquibus obtemperare volebant." (R. de Coggeshale, Chronicon Anglicanum, ed. Stevenson, p. 136). It will be observed that the sentence is based upon the faults committed by John and by his ancestors, towards their suzerains the kings of France. This, it seems to me, has escaped the scholars who have quoted this passage; M. Bémont (op. cit., p. 54 and p. 307) and M. Luchaire (Hist. de France, publiée sous la direction de M. Lavissee, iii, 1re partie, 1901, pp. 128-129) translate it inaccurately. Sir James Ramsay (op. cit., p. 393) and Miss Norgate (John Lackland, p. 84) pass over in silence the reasons given in the sentence, as our chronicler relates them. As for M. Guilhaumez (Bibl. de l'Ec. des Chartes, 1899, pp. 48, 65), he makes very free with the text of Ralph of Coggeshall, which he interprets in the most arbitrary manner.

Breton, and the Pope himself. The testimony of Ralph of Coggeshall cannot prevail against their silence. Innocent III., to whom it was Philip Augustus's strong interest to give information respecting the trial and three chroniclers well situated for hearing it spoken of were ignorant of the condemnation; consequently it never occurred.

The very first reading of this argument reveals one of its weak points; Miss Norgate's scepticism is highly Exaggerated exaggerated, it is "hypercriticism." If we scepticism had to reject all the historical facts which are only known to us from one source, a great part of our knowledge of the past would crumble away. And Miss Norgate would be obliged to suppress many pages of her works, notably of her John Lackland, where she often confides in the unsupported testimony of the biographer who wrote the metrical life of William the Marshal. Given the weakness of historical science and the mediocrity of the materials at its disposal, it is necessary to admit information derived from a single document, on the double condition that the general veracity of that document has been tested on other points, and that on the particular point in question it is not in contradiction with our other sources.

Now this twofold condition is fulfilled as far as concerns the testimony of Ralph of Coggeshall. His Great value of chronicle is indisputably one of the most the evidence of precise and most exact that we have for the Coggeshall first twenty-five years of the thirteenth century. On the other hand, Rigord, Guillaume le Briton and Gervase of Canterbury, whose narrative, be it remarked, is much briefer than Ralph's, say nothing which forbids us to accept the condemnation. All three state that John failed to appear, and suppressing mention of the sentence, relate afterwards, like Ralph of Coggeshall, how Philip Augustus invaded Normandy and destroyed the castle of Boutavant.¹ It is clear that the details of the trial did not interest them. Just as they do not speak of the dilatory pleas put forward by John, of which Ralph of Coggeshall informs us,² they have omitted to relate that a condemnation by default had been pronounced; was not this condemnation a matter of course, and why should the court of Philip Augustus have abstained from passing this sentence the necessity of which was self-evident? The event was so natural that there was hardly need to describe it.

As for the letter addressed by Innocent III. to John Lackland on the 31st of October, 1203, a year and a half after these events and seven months after the death of Arthur, it appears to us not only to be reconcilable with the statements of Ralph of Coggeshall, but to absolutely corroborate them, and this document, in which Miss Norgate seeks her most decisive arguments, appears to be the one which definitively rebuts her thesis.

Innocent III's letter proves it

In this celebrated letter,³ the Pope communicates to the king of England the reasons which Philip Augustus has placed before the Holy See, "per suas literas et nuntios," to justify his conduct. Evidently, Innocent III., being impartial, must have faithfully reproduced these reasons. Now the justification put forward by the king of France, as the Pope summarizes it, confirms the narrative of Ralph de Coggeshall almost word for word, even on the precise point under discussion in Miss Norgate's article;

1. This was a castle which John had promised to deliver up as a pledge of his appearance at the court of Philip Augustus; he had refused to fulfil his promise (Guillaume le Breton, ed. Delaborde, i, pp. 207, 209, 210). The destruction of the castle of Boutavant was therefore a logical consequence of the condemnation; and we may even say that it implies it. Ralph of Coggeshall says with the precision which distinguishes his whole narrative: "Hoc igitur curiae suae iudicium rex Philippus grater acceptans et approbans, coadunato exercitu, confestim invasit castellum Butavant" (Ed. Stevenson, p. 136).

2. Guillaume le Breton gives them only a single word, "post multos defectus."

3. Potthast, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, No. 2013. Miss Norgate dates it by mistake the 29th October.

and it is curious that that scholar was not struck by the singular agreement of the two documents. In both we see that it is on an appeal of vassals that Philip Augustus acted; that he first repeatedly required King John to make peace with his vassals; that, not being able to get any satisfaction, he cited him before his court, with his barons' concurrence. From this point the two narratives differ somewhat; Ralph of Coggeshall insists on the privilege alleged by the King of England, who claimed to have the right not to appear at Paris, while Philip Augustus, in the letter summarized by Innocent III., insists on his attempts at accommodation. But Miss Norgate failed to see, and I do not know whether anybody has yet observed, that the bull of Innocent III. contains a clear allusion to the condemnation: Although the king of France, writes the Pope, had defied you (diffidasset) by the counsel of his barons and his men and war had broken out, he sent you again four of his knights, charged to ascertain whether you were willing to repair the wrongs committed towards him, and to cause you to know that in the contrary case he would henceforth conclude alliance against you with your men, wherever he could. And you have

The "defiance" proves previous sentence

avoided those who sought you. . . ." The term diffidare has here evidently its full and formal sense: it is the solemn rupture of the feudal relationship; now, as M. Luchaire says in his Manuel des Institutions françaises,¹ "defiance can only take place between suzerain and vassal after the suzerain has summoned his feudatory to appear before his court and has had him condemned there, either present or by default." The moment that Philip declares he has defied John Lackland there is proof that the court has previously given its sentence.²

1. Manuel des Institutions françaises (1892), p. 230.

2. The pope adds that Philip Augustus acknowledges having, after these events, received the homage of certain vassals of the king of England, "quod contumaciae tuae asserit imputandum."

It is not surprising that Philip Augustus did not give the Pope circumstantial details respecting the condemnation by default and the text of the sentence. It was not his interest to do this in a letter in which he strove above everything to convince the Pope of his conciliatory spirit; and he contented himself therefore with telling the Pope that by the counsel of his barons and his men, de baronum et hominum suorum consilio, he had broken the feudal tie which bound him to John, diffidasset. This is why, in his letter of the 7th of March, 1205, to the Norman bishops¹ a letter on which Miss Norgate has no right to found an argument, Innocent III., ill-informed upon the trial of 1202, maintains an attitude of reserve. Philip Augustus is requiring the bishops to swear fealty to him because he has acquired Normandy upon a sentence of his court: asserens quod, justitia praeexunte, per sententiam curiae suae Normanniam acquisivit; the Pope, consulted by the bishops as to what they ought to do, cannot give them an answer in default of sufficient information: quia vero nec de jure, nec de consuetudine nobis constat, utpote qui causam, modum et ordinem, aliasque circumstantias ignoramus. He does not say that he has never heard of this condemnation of 1202; but he is ignorant of its precise tenour and the circumstances, and he is not well acquainted with the custom of France.

The letter of the 31st October, 1203, is in short the most important text which we possess for the solution of the problem of the two trials of John Lackland. By the absolute silence it maintains respecting the death of Arthur it proves convincingly that seven months after John's alleged condemnation by the peers of France as the murderer of his nephew, nothing was known at Rome either of the death of the young prince or of the condemnation which was its supposed consequence. By the summary which it gives of the apology which the King of France had made for his conduct, it confirms the assertions of the very exact Ralph de Coggeshall.

1. Potthast, op. cit., No. 2434.

M. Bémont's conclusions then still hold the field. John Lackland was not condemned to death by the court of France as murderer of Arthur in 1203, but he was condemned in 1202 by default, to the loss of his French fief, for disobedience and refusal of service to his suzerain.

M. Bémont's conclusions hold their ground

The appeal of the Poitevin barons, a fine opportunity for preparing annexations, eagerly seized by Philip Augustus, was thus the indirect cause of the separation of Normandy and England; an event of immense importance for the English constitution as well as for French policy; for the monarchy of the Plantagenets was suddenly detached from a province from which it had derived a part of its institutions and its administrative staff, and, on the other hand, as Stubbs says, "the king found himself face to face with the English people."

Constitutional
importance of the question

XI.

AN "UNKNOWN CHARTER OF LIBERTIES."

THERE exists in our Trésor des Chartes a list of "concessions of King John" to his barons, which was printed as early as 1863 by Teulet, in his Layettes.¹ This document had completely escaped scholars working upon English history until the moment at which it was "discovered" by Mr. Round in a copy forming part of the Rymer Transcripts, and published by him in the English Historical Review.² It is celebrated now under the name, inaccurate it will be seen, which Mr. Round has given to it of the "Unknown Charter of Liberties." As this so-called "Unknown Charter of English Liberties," certainly interesting, has only been studied since 1893, as Stubbs does not quote a single line of it, as he did not insert it in the last edition of his Select Charters, and as it is not to be found correctly transcribed in any of the books which French libraries usually possess, we reproduce it here.³

The manuscript, the writing of which is French and dates from the first quarter of the thirteenth century, contains, first, a copy of the charter of Henry I., preceded by these words: "Charta quam Henricus, communi baronum consilio rex coronatus, eisdem et prelati regni Angliæ

1. Layettes du Trésor des Chartes, publ. par A. Teulet, i, 1863, p. 423.

2. J. H. Round, An unknown Charter of Liberties, English Histor. Review, viii, 1893, pp. 288 sqq.

3. We shall follow the text given by Mr. MacKechnie, Magna Carta, pp. 569-570.

plurima privilegia concedit," and followed by the note : "Hec est carta regis Henrici per quam barones querunt libertates, et hec consequentia concedit rex Johannes.¹

Next follows the list of the "concessions of King John," here given; we shall indicate for each clause² the analogous clauses of the charter of Henry I.,³ of the Articuli Baronum (June, 1215)⁴ and of the Great Charter :⁵

1. "Concedit rex Johannes quod non capiet hominem absque iudicio, nec aliquid accipiet pro justitia, nec injustitiam faciet" (Cf. Articles of the Barons, art. 29 and 30; Great Charter, art. 39 and 40.⁶)

2. "Et si contingat quod meus baro vel homo meus moriatur et heres suus sit in etate, terram suam debeo ei reddere per rectum releveium absque magis capiendi." (Cf. Charter of Henry I., 2; Articles of the Barons, 1; Great Charter, 2.)

3. "Et si ita sit quod heres sit infra etatem, debeo quatuor militibus de legalioribus feodi terram bajulare in custodia, et illi cum meo famulo debent mihi reddere exitus terre sine venditione nemorum et sine redemptione hominum et sine destructione parci et vivarii; et tunc quando ille heres erit in etate, terram ei reddam quietam." (Cf. Articles of the Barons, 2—3; Charter, 3—4.)

4. "Si femina sit heres terre, debeo eam maritare, consilio generis sui, ita non sit disparagiata. Et si una vice eam dederó, amplius eam dare non possum, sed se

1. Round, loc. cit., p. 288, and H. Hall, quoting a letter of M. Bémont, in English Histor. Review, ix, 1894, p. 327.

2. The division into clauses does not exist in the original any more than it does in the Great Charter.

3. Liebermann, Gesetze, i, pp. 521 sqq., or Bémont, Chartes des libertés anglaises, pp. 3 sqq.

4. Bémont, pp. 15 sqq. The true title is : Capitula que barones petunt et dominus rex concedit.

5. Bémont, pp. 26 sqq.

6. Cf. also the letter patent of the 10th of May, 1215, in Rymer, Rec. edition, i, p. 128, and the excellent commentary which Mr. MacKechnie gives on article 39 of the Great Charter (Magna Carta, pp. 436 sqq.).

maritabit ad libitum suum, sed non inimicis meis." (Cf. Henry I., 3; Articles, 3 and 17; Charter, 6 and 8.)

5. "Si contingat quod baro aut homo meus moriatur, concedo ut pecunia sua dividatur sicut ipse dividerit; et si preoccupatus fuerit aut armis aut infirmitate improvisa, uxor ejus, aut liberi, aut parentes et amici propinquiore, pro ejus anima, dividant." (Cf. Henry I., 7; Articles, 15—16; Charter, 26—27.)

6. "Et uxor ejus non abibit de hospitio infra XL dies et donec dotem suam decenter habuerit, et maritagium habebit." (Cf. Henry I., 4; Articles, 4; Charter, 7.)

7. "Adhuc hominibus meis concedo ne eant in exercitu extra Anglia nisi in Normanniam et in Britanniam et hoc decenter; quod si aliquis debet inde servitium decem militum, consilio baronum meorum alleviabitur."

8. "Et si scutagium evenerit in terra, una marca argenti capietur de feodo militis; et si gravamen¹ exercitus contigerit, amplius caperetur consilio baronum regni." (Cf. Articles, 32; Charter, 12.)

9. "Adhuc concedo ut omnes forestas quas pater meus et frater meus et ego afforestavimus, deafforesto." (Cf. Henry I., 10; Articles, 47; Charter, 47, 53.)

10. "Adhuc concedo ut milites qui in antiquis forestis meis suum nemus habent, habeant nemus amodo ad herbergagia sua et ad arrendum; et habeant foresterium suum; et ego tantum modo unum qui servet pecudes meas." (Cf. Articles, 39; Charter, 47.)

11. "Et si aliquis hominum meorum moriatur qui Judeis debeat, debitum non usurabit quamdiu heres ejus sit infra etatem." (Cf. Articles, 34; Charter, 10.)

12. "Et concedo ne homo perdat pro pecude vitam neque membra." (Cf. Articles, 39; Charter, 47; Charter of the Forest, of 1217, article 10.)

What is this document? What is its origin, what does it represent?

1. Mr. Hubert Hall, loc. cit., p. 329, proposes the correction: allevamen.

None of the numerous hypotheses formulated so far by English scholars quite satisfies us. We must put aside to begin with, as untenable, the idea of a charter granted by John, in 1213, to the barons of the North, to the "Norois,"¹ and the supposition of a forged coronation charter of John Lackland, fabricated in 1216—1217 to legitimize the pretensions of Lewis of France.²

Mr. Prothero's theory is less unacceptable; it is that it was a charter of liberties offered by the king to the baronage, in the first four months of the year 1215, in order to calm the discontent and uneasiness of the nobles, in the same way that he had wished to appease the clergy by granting them liberty of election.³

Mr. Prothero remarks with reason that this list of concessions interests almost exclusively the nobility. But, even admitting that the form of the document authorises this supposition, it would be very singular that no chronicler should have made any allusion to so important an offer; very singular that the nobility should have rejected it; very singular, finally, that John should have spontaneously offered never to require the military service of the English knights, for his expeditions in the centre and south of France, seeing that this weighty concession is not mentioned in the Great Charter itself. Mr. MacKechnie makes the converse supposition; that we have here not an offer of the king, but a preparatory schedule proposed by the barons in the month of April, 1215, and mentioned moreover by Roger of Wendover.⁴

But Roger of Wendover says that this schedule was

1. This is the explanation proposed, with all reserves, by Mr. Round, English Historical Review, viii, 1893, pp. 292 sqq. See the decisive objections of Mr. Prothero, ibidem, ix, 1894, pp. 118 sqq.

2. See the article by Mr. Hubert Hall, ibidem, ix, 1894, pp. 326 sqq.

3. Prothero, Note on an unknown Charter of Liberties, ibidem, ix, 1894, p. 120.

4. MacKechnie, Magna Carta, p. 204.

rejected by the king,¹ and our text runs: "hec consequentia concedit rex Johannes."

In these explanations, too, no account is taken of the singularly clumsy form which this document assumes.

Neither an authentic nor an apocryphal charter We have seen that it commences thus: "concedit rex Johannes quod . . .," and that in the following sentence the king begins to speak, expressing himself in the first person: he even expresses himself in the first person singular, contrary to the usage of John Lackland's chancery. If we had to do with a charter offered by the king, or a document proposed by the barons, or even with a forged charter fabricated by the French, these anomalies would not present themselves.

We believe, therefore, with Mr. H. W. C. Davis, who has quite recently studied the problem afresh,² that the so-called "unknown charter," is not a charter, but an informal report of the negotiations which ended in the drawing up of the Great Charter. By whom was it drawn up and at what exact moment? We will not say with Mr. Davis, that the author, having transcribed the charter of Henry I. with so pious a respect was evidently a partisan of the barons; that his Latin betrays an English rather than a French origin;³ that the composition of article 12 reveals the humbleness of his rank;⁴ nor that the document must have been drawn up during the three

1. "Affirmavit tandem cum juramento furibundus, quod nunquam tales illis concederet libertates, unde ipse efficeretur servus" (Wendover, in Matt. Paris, Chron. Maj.; ed. Luard (Rolls series), ii, p. 586).

2. In the English Historical Review, xx, 1905, pp. 719 sqq.

3. Mr. Hubert Hall, loc. cit., p. 333, on the contrary, points out "Gallicisms" in it. These hypotheses seem to me very unprofitable.

4. The author, according to Mr. Davis, declaims in literary rather than legal phrase, against the Forest Law, so hard upon poor people. Mr. Davis does not notice that: (1) The Forest Law also greatly injured the interests of the barons; (2) The Charter of the Forest, of 1217, contains an article drawn up in very similar terms (Art. 10 in Bémont, p. 67): "Nullus de cetero amittat vitam vel membra pro venacione nostra."

days¹ which passed between the acceptance of the Articuli Baronum and the publication of the Great Charter. To us it seems possible to affirm this, and this only :

1. The document is in close relation with the Articuli Baronum and the Great Charter. Only the article relative to the service in the host abroad and two complementary clauses touching the Forest, have no equivalent in the Articuli Baronum, or the Charter.

2. Our document is not an official text. It is a memorandum, it is notes taken by a spectator. He is well informed; he is struck by the importance attached by the barons to the charter of Henry I., to the extent of transcribing that charter entire at the beginning of his minute; he reports certain of the king's concessions almost in the terms in which they were officially drafted. But he is neither a jurist, for his diction is at times very loose,² nor a personage directly interested in the concessions made, for he often does not understand the sense of them and distorts them in the summary he gives of them.³

1. MacKechnie, Magna Carta, p. 45, has proved that the Articuli Baronum were accepted by the king and sealed with his seal on the 15th of June (the date borne by the Great Charter itself) and that the Great Charter was sealed and published on the 19th.

2. Cf. the inexact drafting of article 1; the cum meo famulo of article 3, etc.

3. Clause 1 is a vague and inaccurate summary of the pretensions so clearly formulated in the Articles of the Barons and the Great Charter. One would not suspect, in reading it, that what the barons really wished for was a return to feudal justice, as it existed before the great legal and judicial revolution of the reign of Henry II. In article 5 the demands of the barons as regards inheritances have not been well understood; the main object was to prevent the king's servants from carrying out wrongful seizures; the true sense of clauses 26-27 of the Great Charter does not appear here. Similarly, in article 11, the author of our document did not perhaps understand that the barons, as far as concerns debts to the Jews, chiefly wished to protect themselves against the greed of the king. Mr. Hubert Hall (see above, p. 118, note 1) thinks that in article 8 the scribe has replaced alleramen by gravamen; in our opinion it is not a question of an error of transcription; the French agent, who, let us believe, was the author of the document, must have supposed that scutage was a simple tax in substitution for military service, such as existed in France for the "roturiers" in the

3. Our document exists in the original in the Trésor des Chartes, in which our kings preserved the records which directly interested the Crown of France, its rights and its designs. The handwriting is French, and there is no strong reason for believing that the compiler was an Englishman. Still, as Mr. Davis has recognised, he might have been an Englishman in the service of the king of France.

However this may be, it appears to us beyond question that the manuscript has been shut up in the layettes of the Trésor since the times of Philip Augustus. That prince, as we know, had agencies on the other side of the Channel; he offered succour to the rebel barons, sent the pirate Eustace the Monk to convey war machines to them, and this attitude helped to bring about the concession of the Great Charter.¹

Evidently he had confidential agents who kept him informed respecting the negotiations taking place between John Lackland and his barons. The alleged "unknown charter of English Liberties" is the report of an agent of Philip Augustus.

4. The very character of our document forbids us to assign a precise date to it. We can only say that it is a little anterior to the Articuli Baronum, and dates from a moment at which the agreement between the king and the barons already appears as certain, without being definite. Everything inclines us to believe that negotiations were entered upon before the Runnymede interview, and we have before us an account of these negotiations, at a moment when the rumour ran that such and such time of Philip Augustus (see Borrelli de Serres, Recherches sur divers services publics, i, 1895, pp. 467 sqq.) and that the tax became heavier if the service in the host required was more exacting. Allevamen exercitus, proposed by Mr. Hubert Hall, would make the meaning as follows: If there is exemption from service the tax to pay on this count (and to add to the scutage) shall be determined upon the advice of the barons.

1. See my Etude sur la vie et le règne de Louis VIII., p. 69.

concessions had been granted by the king. If Philip Augustus' agent had written after the publication of the Articuli Baronum or of the Great Charter, he would have contented himself with sending into France a copy of the official text.

Is this as much as to say that the "unknown charter" has no historical interest? Far from it. It has a new proof of the curiosity with which events in England were followed in France; a new proof also of the part played by the spirit of tradition and of the prestige exercised by the charter of Henry I. In addition, it contains a clause which does not occur either in the Articles of the Barons or in the Great Charter, and clauses which are only to be found there in a very altered form; in this way it enlightens us respecting the hesitations and mutual concessions of the two parties, and explains better why the barons gave this or that form to certain of their claims. This is what the scholars who have studied it up till now have not sufficiently observed.

The clauses on the repression of judicial abuses committed by the king (article 1), on the amount of the feudal relief (article 2), on the right of wardship (article 3), on the debts of minors to the Jews (article 11), on the marriage of heiresses (article 4), on dowry and the dower of widows (article 6), on the disposal of pecuniary inheritances after the decease of the testator or intestate person (article 5), are to be found again, in a more technical and generally a more complete form, in the Great Charter.¹ Some of them resemble more the Articuli Baronum, others the definitive charter. There is no need to insist at length on the details of the wording, as the differences may depend on the varying care and success with which the author of our document has summarized what he intended to report, and, I repeat, he appears not to have always understood the exact sense of the clauses which he noted.

1. On the subject of clause 5, see Miss Mary Bateson, Borough Customs, ii, 1906, p. cxliii.

What is more interesting is this : articles 9, 10, and 12 touching the Royal forest, give us light upon the concessions which the barons had at first intended to wrest from the king.¹ According to clause 9, John would appear to have engaged to disafforest the forests created by himself, by Richard, and by Henry II: In clause 47 of the Articuli Baronum and of the Great Charter, it is only the forests created in the reign of John that are to be disafforested. Article 53 of the Charter proves however that the king had pledged himself to enquire whether certain forests of Richard and Henry II. ought not to be disafforested; our document is useful therefore for the understanding of article 53 of the Great Charter. Articles 10 and 12 of our document establish that the knights who possess a wood in the royal forests of ancient date, may henceforth cut trees and branches there for building and fuel; they shall have in their wood a forester in their service, and the king can only place a single forester there, for the purpose of protecting the game. According to article 12, no one may be condemned to death or to mutilation, for an offence touching the royal game. Important as were these concessions, the barons were not content with them; they preferred, in clause 39 of the Articuli and clause 48 of the Great Charter, to demand the constitution of elective juries in each county, to make enquiry concerning all the "evil customs" of the royal forests. The "evil customs" denounced by these juries of inquest were to be immediately abolished; a plan very dangerous to the royal authority, and which would have ended in the complete suppression of a prerogative to which the Norman and Angevin kings attached the highest value. As a matter of fact, the civil war prevented these juries from completing their work. The council of regency of Henry III., in 1217, granted a Forest Charter: in article 10, the penalty of death and mutilation is abolished for poaching offences. We see that as early as 1215 the barons had demanded the abolition of these cruel penalties.

1. Stubbs (i, p. 434 sqq.) has explained what the Royal Forest was and how it was administered. Cf. G. J. Turner, Preface to the Select pleas of the Forest (1901) and the good summary of MacKechnie, Magna Carta, pp. 482 sqq. This irritating question of the Forest interested the baronage as well as the popular classes. It was the people of small consequence who suffered most from the abuse of power of the royal foresters; but the barons who had lands comprised within the forest bounds also submitted with impatience to the prohibitions of every kind issued to protect the trees and game.

According to articles 7 and 8 of our document, the men of the king do not owe military service outside England, except in Normandy and in Brittany, and even then under certain conditions (et hoc decenter); if any one owes the service of ten knights, the assembly of the barons will grant him an "alleviation."¹ If the king levies a scutage, he will only take a mark of silver from each knight's fee.²

These clauses are very interesting. All that is said in the Articuli Baronum (art. 32) and in the Great Charter (art. 12) is that, beyond the aid in the three cases, no scutage can be levied without the consent of the Commune Consilium regni, and they were contented with specifying that the rate should be "reasonable." At the time to which our document belongs, we see that the barons did not think of preventing the king from freely levying the scutage of one mark. On the other hand, it seems that, by means of mutual concessions,

1. That is to say, according to Mr. Hall's interpretation (loc. cit., p. 327), instead of furnishing knights he will pay a composition.

2. The text adds: if there is an increase of military obligations, a higher scutage may be collected, but on the counsel of the barons of the realm. As we have said above (p. 121, n. 3), there must be a mistake here. Scutage was not a mere tax for providing substitutes as Stubbs tended to believe; at any rate, in the reign of John, it was an addition to the effective military service, and did not exempt from it. See above, p. 56, note 1, a note on scutage.

they had come to an agreement with the king for the settlement of the troublesome question of military service in France; they agreed to accompany him in the provinces bordering on the Channel, but not beyond. Why is any clause of this kind wanting in the Articuli Baronum and the Great Charter? We may conjecture that neither the king nor the barons cared to make engagements on this head and to maintain the ephemeral concessions the memory of which is preserved in the notes we have just analysed.

Such is the supposed "unknown charter of English liberties." It will be observed that there is no question

Almost all these concessions relate to the nobility alone	either of the clergy or the merchants, or the towns, and that the royal concessions it contains are made entirely or almost entirely to the nobility. Was it because in the eyes of the French agent who drew up these notes, the negotiations between the king and the barons concerned very specially the particular interests of the latter? And, if this hypothesis is correct, was the French agent wrong? That is a question we shall now have to discuss.
---	--

XII.

THE GREAT CHARTER.

IT will be well to describe here the ideas which appear to prevail to-day, in regard to the constitutional importance of the Great Charter; they are not at all in agreement with the classical, "orthodox" exposition of Stubbs.

Importance of the Great
Charter

The bishop of Oxford considers that the Great Charter is the work of the whole nation joined in a coalition against the king: "The demands of the barons," he cries in an almost lyrical tone, "were no selfish exaction of privilege for themselves. . . . They maintain and

According to Stubbs it is the work of the nation

secure the right of the whole people as against themselves as well as against their master; clause by clause, the rights of the commons are provided for as well as the rights of the nobles. . . . The Great Charter is the first great public act of the nation after it has realised its own identity." The 12th and following articles, concerning the levy of scutages and aids and the summons of the Magnum Concilium are "those to which the greatest constitutional interest belongs; for they admit the right of the nation to ordain taxation." ¹

Hallam,² Gneist,³ Green,⁴ M. Glasson,⁵ Boutmy,⁶

1. Stubbs, Const. Hist., i, 570, 571, 573, 579. Cf. Stubbs' preface to the Historical Collections of Walter of Coventry (Rolls series), ii, p. lxxi sqq.

2. Middle Ages, ii, 447; quoted by MacKechnie, Magna Carta, p. 134.

3. History of Engl. Parliament; English translation by A. H. Keane, 4th edition, 1895, p. 103.

4. Short History of the English People, illus. ed., i, 240 sqq.

5. Hist. du droit et des instit. de l'Angleterre, iii, 1882, p. 6.

6. Développement de la Constitution de la Soc. politique en Angleterre, 1887, p. 55., and English Translation by I. M. Eaden (The English Constitution, 1891), p. 29.

also regard the Great Charter as a constitutional victory gained by the nation as a whole over the king. The majority of English historians of the 19th century exalted the Great Charter with the same fervour, and the "sentimental force" which the course of historical events has given to this contract between King John, the English Church, and the liberi homines of the kingdom is not yet exhausted.

Texts have to be read, however, without preoccupying ourselves with the importance which has been attributed to them in later ages, and if we apply a Reaction in like method to the study of the Great modern criticism Charter, we form a very different judgment upon it. Without claiming to have been the initiator of this reaction,¹ I may be allowed to recall, that, in a work published in 1894, I drew very different conclusions from the study of the sources used by Stubbs and also of documents which he had not utilised, and that I wrote as follows: "The barons had no suspicion that they would one day be called the founders of English liberty. The patriotism of writers on the other side of the Channel has singularly misrepresented the nature of this crisis. They extol the noble simplicity with which the people asserted its rights. But the authors of the Great Charter had no theories or general ideas at all. They were guided by a crowd of small and very practical motives in extorting this form of security from John Lackland."²

A decade ago the Great Charter underwent in England itself a critical examination which was not favourable to it. In their admirable History of English Law of which

1. Hallam said: "It has been lately the fashion to depreciate the value of Magna Carta, as if it had sprung from the private ambition of a few selfish barons, and redressed only some feudal abuses" (quoted by MacKechnie, Magna Carta, p. 134). I do not know what authors are alluded to in this passage, and there is no use in trying to find out. In any case this "depreciation" is excessive. The Great Charter did not do nothing but "redress some feudal abuses." As we shall see, it struck at all the abuses of the royal power, from which the nobility had to suffer, directly or indirectly.

2. Etude sur la vie et le règne de Louis VIII., pp. 57-58.

the first edition appeared in 1895, Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Maitland observe very justly that it contains almost no novelty. It is essentially a conservative or even reactionary document. Its most salient characteristic is the restoration of the old feudal law, violated by John Lackland, and perhaps its practically most important clauses, because they could be really applied, were, that for example which limited the right of relief, or that which forbade the king to keep the land of a felon for more than a year and a day, to the detriment of the lord. Upon other points, the Great Charter marks an ecclesiastical and aristocratic reaction against the growth of the crown.¹ Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Maitland express this opinion with discretion, and without denying the high value of the Great Charter. Another jurist, Mr. Edward Jenks, has shown less reserve: he sees in the movement of 1215 nothing but an attempt at a feudal reaction, and showers the bolts of his iconoclastic zeal on the "myth of the Great Charter."²

Miss Kate Norgate in her John Lackland, gives only a brief and superficial analysis of the Great Charter. But at least she shows very clearly that the authors of this "peace" were, not the body of the English baronage, but to use the evidently very exact words of Ralph of Coggeshall, "the archbishop of Canterbury, several bishops and some barons." The attitude of the barons before the crisis of 1215 and after the conclusion of the pact of Runnymede, proves clearly, she says, that the mass of the baronage were incapable of rising to the

1. Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, 2nd edition, 1898, i, pp. 171 sqq. See also MacKechnie, op. cit.; this careful commentator has shown that as a whole the Great Charter restores custom; by that very fact, it is at times reactionary; on some points only, it marks a step in advance.

2. The Myth of Magna Carta in the Independent Review, Nov., 1904.

conception of a contract between the king and all the free classes of the nation. Before the crisis of 1215, the barons had let John persecute the Church without doing anything to defend it; after the signature of the Charter, these pretended champions of Right did not even know how to respect their plighted faith.¹ Mr. Pollard, in his Henry VIII., has developed an analogous idea: vigorously and thoroughly enquiring why the Tudors were able to reign despotically, he finds only one possible explanation. We must renounce

England has not always been eager for liberty that idea—an idea so dear to Stubbs—that for seven hundred years England has been the messenger of liberty in the world.

The English were but men and, in a general way, "the English ideal was closely subordinated to the passion for material prosperity," and not to the love of liberty for its own sake. That the English have always burned with enthusiasm for parliamentary government, is a legend invented by modern doctrinaires. The Great Charter, the symbol of this alleged political genius of the Anglo-Saxon race, only became in reality the "palladium of English liberty" in the 17th century, to serve the necessities of the anti-monarchical opposition, and for that purpose it was greatly distorted and travestied. In the 16th century, it did not so to speak come into question, it had been forgotten: Shakespeare does not say a word about it in his "King John."²

We are now a long way off from the panegyrics in which the Great Charter is represented as the source of all the greatness and all the political institutions of England, far even from the more measured appreciation of Stubbs. Whatever the respect with which we must regard the work of that eminent scholar, it is clear that, upon the causes of the crisis of

1. John Lackland (1902), pp. 219, 234, 236 sqq., and passim.

2. A. F. Pollard, Henry VIII., ed. in 18mo (1905), p. 33 sqq.

1215, upon the character of the compact, upon the conceptions and the state of mind which engendered it, upon the influence it has had in the development of English liberties, we can no longer profess in all respects the same opinion as he did. Recently a new and learned commentary on the Great Charter has been published¹ of which we shall have to speak again; in reading this work of Mr. MacKechnie, the most thorough and balanced which has been written on the subject, we receive the impression that Stubbs was the dupe of many illusions, and that the historians of his generation have had difficulty in guarding themselves against the legends created by the exaltation of patriotism and by political strife.

It is quite clear that history is written to-day with more sobriety; but we must add that we are better informed respecting the crisis of 1215 than they were or could be at the time at which the first volume of the Constitutional History appeared. In the course of a quarter of a century, English, German, and French scholarship, has thrown much light on most of the questions which are touched on in the Great Charter, and it cannot now be interpreted as it used to be. Moreover, we are enlightened by new documents.

The term "new document" cannot, to speak exactly, be applied to the most important of those of which I am thinking: the Histoire des ducs de Normandie et des rois d'Angleterre, published in 1840 by Francisque Michel. But Stubbs and his contemporaries, who somewhat strangely neglected works of French scholarship, were not acquainted with this chronicle and never utilised it. I believe myself to have been the first to make use of it, at least as far as regards

New light on the subject

Narrative of the "Histoire des ducs de Normandie"

1. W. S. MacKechnie, Magna Carta, 1905.

the history of England.¹ It was written about 1220 by a minstrel attached to Robert of Béthune, who was one of King John's familiars. It is interesting to see how this contemporary summarizes events, and what he recollects of the Great Charter. The barons, he says: "decided to demand of the king that he should observe in regard to them the charters which King Henry, who was his father's grandfather, had granted to their ancestors, and which King Stephen had confirmed to them; and if he refused to do this, they would all throw off their allegiance to him and make war upon him until he was forced to do it. So he had to make such a peace there as the barons wished; there he was forced to agree that a woman should never be married in a quarter where she would be disparaged. This was the best agreement which he made with them, had it been well kept. In addition he had to agree that he would never cause a man to lose member or life for any wild beast that he took; but that he should be able to atone for it by a fine; these two things could readily be tolerated. The reliefs of lands, which were too high, he had to fix at such a rate as they willed to have them. The highest powers of jurisdiction they insisted on having in their lands. Many other things they demanded with much reason, of which I am unable to inform you. Over and above all this they desired that 25 barons should be chosen, and by the judgment of these 25 the king should govern them in all things, and through them redress all the wrongs he should do to them, and they also, on the other hand, would through them redress all the wrongs that they should do to him. Also they further desired, along with all this, that the king should never have power to appoint a bailiff in his land except through the 25. All this the king was forced to concede. For the observance of this peace the king gave his charter to the barons as one who could not help himself."

1. See my Etude sur la vie et le règne de Louis VIII., Introduction, pp. xx-xxi.

It will be convenient to subjoin the original text of the passages here translated :

[Li baron] deviserent que il demanderoient al roi que il lor tenist les chartres que il rois Henris qui fu ayous son père avoit données a lor ancissours et que li rois Estievenes lor avoit confremées ; et se il faire ne le voloit, il le desfieroient tout ensamble, et le guerrieroient tant que il par force le feroit Si li couvint là tel pais faire comme li baron vaurrent ; là li couvint-il avoir en couvent à force que jamais feme ne marieroit ou liu ù elle fust desparagie. Chou fu la miudre couvenence que il lor fist, s'elle fust bien tenue. O, tout chou li couvint-il avoir en couvent ke jamais ne feroit pierdre home membre ne vie por bieste sauvage k'il presist;¹ mais raiembre le pooit: ces deus choses pooit-on bien souffrir. Les rachas des tierres, qui trop grant estoient, li couvint metre à tel fuer comme il vaurrent deviser. Toutes hautes justices vaurrent-il avoir en lor tierres. Mainte autre chose lor requisent ù assés ot de raison, que je ne vous sai pas nommer. Desus tout chou vorrent-il que XXV baron fussent esliut, et par le jugement de ces XXV les menast li rois de toutes choses, et toz les tors que il lor feroit lor adreçast par eus, et il autresi de l'autre part li adreçeroient toz les tors que il li feroient par eus. Et si vorrent encore avec tout chou que li rois ne peust jamais metre en sa tierre bailliu, se par les XXV non. Tout chou couvint le roi otriier à force. De cele pais tenir donna li rois sa chartre as barons, comme chil qui amender ne le pot.²

In this summary, which is very incomplete, but accurate enough on the whole, the Great Charter appears as a purely feudal compact. What struck the minstrel, what evidently struck the men of his time, is that the king, under force and compulsion, had to promise not to disparage heiresses, to diminish the rights of relief, to renounce the strict laws which protected his forests, to respect the rights of justice of the feudal lords, and to recognise the existence of a commission of twenty-five barons, charged to bring to his notice the grievances of the nobility. Not a word of the alleged alliance between the baronage and

1. This clause does not exist textually in the Great Charter. Cf. above, p. 125.

2. Histoire des ducs de Normandie, pp. 145-146, 149-150.

the rest of the nation. The barons are proud, puffed up with their importance, and think only of themselves. "On the strength of this wretched peace they treated him with such pride as must move all the world to pity. They required him to observe quite faithfully what he had agreed with them; but what they had previously agreed with their men they were unwilling to observe."¹

The biographer of William the Marshal, in the celebrated poem discovered by Paul Meyer, says in two words "That the barons for their franchises came to the king"² and afterwards relates at great length the war which followed the annulling of the Great Charter. But he says not a word about the Great Charter itself, does not even quote it.

These are, it is true, chronicles written by minstrels and heralds who are only interested in the doings of the nobles and in feats of arms. But the "Unknown Charter" "unknown charter" which we have recited and commented on above has by no means that character. It is a summary of negotiations between John and his adversaries, the work no doubt of an agent of Philip Augustus, and that king had the greatest interest in knowing the real grounds of the quarrel. Now we have seen that it is concerned almost exclusively with concessions granted to the nobles.

That the Great Charter was drawn up for the baronage and not for the nation as a whole is therefore our deduction from documents which Stubbs did not make use of. But it is also the deduction to be drawn from the chronicles which he used, and, lastly, from the Charter itself. Let us read again without preconcep-

The classical narratives—Wendover, Coggeshall,
Barnwell

1. Avoec toute la vilaine pais, li moustroient-il tel orguel que tous li mons en deust avoir pitié. Il voloient que il moult bien lor tenist chou que en couvent lor avoit; mais chou que il avoient en covent à lor homes avant ne voloient-il tenir (Ibidem, p. 151.)

2. Que li baron por lor franchises vindrent al rei . . . Histoire de Guillaume le Maréchal, ed. Paul Meyer, (Soc. de l'Histoire de France), ii, pp. 177 sqq.

tion the three principal narratives of the crisis of 1215, those of Roger of Wendover,¹ of Ralph of Coggeshall² and of the Canon of Barnwell.³ We see there that the insurrection is an entirely feudal one; they record only the complicity of the Archbishop of Canterbury and certain bishops and of the "rich men"⁴ of London. The insurgents wished "to revive the liberties expressed in the charter of King Henry I.,"⁵ which guaranteed the Church and the baronage against a certain number of royal abuses.

These chroniclers speak neither of consent to taxation nor of national union against the king. The Runnymede assembly is composed of "tota Angliae nobilitas regni,"⁶ and the Great Charter is a "quasi pax inter regem et barones."⁷ The chroniclers are perfectly in agreement with Innocent III., who, in his bull of the 24th August, 1215,⁸ speaks of the rebellion of the "magnates et nobiles Angliae," and with John Lackland himself, who calls the crisis the "discordia inter nos et barones nostros," and recognises that he is signing a sort of treaty of peace with his barons.⁹

Let us take the text of the Great Charter, not to recommence clause by clause an analysis already made

1. In the edition of the Chronica Majora of Matthew Paris, (Rolls Ser.), ii, pp. 582, 583, 584-589.

2. Ed. Stevenson (Rolls series), pp. 170-173.

3. In the Historical Collections of Walter of Coventry, ed. Stubbs (Rolls series), ii. pp. 217-221.

4. "Favebant enim baronibus divites civitatis, et ideo pauperes obmurmurare (or : obloqui) metuebant" (Wendover, p. 587).

5. "Chartam regis Henrici primi proferunt quae libertates exprimit quas proceres, olim abolitas, nunc resuscitare contendunt" (Coggeshall, p. 170).

6. Wendover, p. 589.

7. Coggeshall, p. 172.

8. Printed by (among others) Bémont, Chartes des Libertés Anglaises pp. 41 sqq

9. "Ad melius sopiendum discordiam inter nos et barones nostros motam" (Great Charter, art. 61; see also art. 1). Cf. art. 52: "in securitate pacis. . . ."

Text of the Great Charter

by Stubbs,¹ but to investigate whether in reality "the barons maintain and secure the rights of the whole people as against themselves as well as against their master," and whether "the rights of the commons are provided for as well as the rights of the nobles," whether, again, the famous articles 12 and 14 "admit the right of the nation to ordain taxation." ²

Clauses
exclusively concerning clergy and nobility

Of the sixty-three clauses into which modern editors divide the provisions, often somewhat ill arranged, of the charter of the 15th of June, 1215,³ about fourteen are temporary articles or relate to the execution of the agreement. Of the forty-nine which remain two concern the clergy,⁴ twenty-four specially secure the baronage against the abuse which the king made of his rights as suzerain.⁵ These articles, placed for the most

1. Const. Hist., i, pp. 572—579. This analysis is in general faithful and exact; but on many points, the interpretation is no longer acceptable. We refer our readers once for all to the excellent commentary by MacKechnie.

2. Const. Hist., i, 570 and 573.

3. We shall quote the Great Charter and the Articles of the Barons (which preceded it and form a sort of first draft of it authentic and approved by the king), from the excellent collection of Chartes des Libertés Anglaises of M. Bémont.

4. Arts 1 and 22.

5. Art. 2 to 12, 14 to 16, 21, 26, 27, 29, 32, 34, 37, 39, 43, 46. These articles of feudal law, precise and well drafted, restore ancient custom; two of them, articles 34 and 39, would to some extent have ruined the royal system of justice and the legal progress accomplished since the reign of Henry II., had they been applied in their letter and their spirit, and it is of them above all that we have been thinking in speaking of the reactionary character of the Great Charter: article 34 in fact forbade the king to call up suits touching property, and article 39 restored judgement by peers. They were evidently evoked by the disquieting development of royal justice at the expense of seignorial justice, and by the executions without sentence with which John Lackland had threatened the barons: "Nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittemus, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum vel per legem terre." I do not, however, believe that article 39 was drafted with the intention of denying the competence of the professional judges (Cf. article 18 on the iters), and Mr. MacKechnie seems to me to be wrong in seeing in the lex terre the old national procedure by battle, compurgation, and ordeal. The lex terre, is doubtless the custom of part at the beginning of the document, are evidently its fundamental clauses in the minds of the authors of the agreement. Ten others concern the general exercise of the royal justice.¹ The benefit of them could not be confined to the barons alone; but it is clear that it was of themselves that the barons were thinking when exacting these guarantees, which, without exception, have for them, directly or indirectly, a powerful interest.² It is the same with the important articles which set a limit to the exactions of the sheriffs, to abuses of purveyance, etc. The special régime of the royal Forest was particularly hard on the poor people, but it very much annoyed and irritated the barons themselves.³

In conclusion, let us take the clauses which appear to be drafted specially in favour of the people of the towns and villages. It is by a study of them that we can verify whether the Great Charter was made "to secure as well the rights of the common people as those of the nobles," and whether "the demands of the barons were no selfish exaction of privilege for themselves."

"Let the city of London," says article 13, "have all its ancient liberties and free customs as well on land the realm in a general sense, the lex regni; cf. the charter granted to the barons on the 10th of May, to settle the same question: "nec super eos per vim vel per arma ibimus, nisi per legem regni nostri, etc." (Bémont, p. 33, note).

1. Art: 17, 18, 19, 20, 24, 36, 38, 40, 45, 54.

2. Clause 20, for example, which might seem "democratic," had a financial interest for the lords. See below. Article 17 similarly seems made for the smaller litigants: "Communia placita non sequantur curiam nostram, set teneantur in aliquo loco certo." But this definite fixing of the court of common pleas (that is to say of the suits which did not interest the king personally) at Westminster was not important for the smaller litigants only. The barons might be ruined by the journeys they were until then obliged to make in order to obtain justice. The case of Richard of Anesty, who had to follow the king and his court through England, Normandy, Aquitaine and Anjou for five years, is quite characteristic (See MacKechnie, pp. 309-310, and Stubbs, i, 642 and note 1. Anesty is Anstey in the county of Hertford; see Round, in Victoria History of Essex, i. p. 379.)

3. Clauses 23, 25, 28, 30, 31, 33, 35, 41, 44, 47, 48.

Clauses for the towns as on water.”¹ Such is the vague and commonplace concession obtained by the Londoners as the price of their aid. As for the free customs of the other towns, the barons did not even ask, in their Articuli, that the king should confirm them. It was only at the time of the definitive drafting of the Great Charter that, perhaps in order to further weaken by generalising the value of the promises made to the Londoners, this phrase was added: “In addition we wish and grant that all the other cities, boroughs, towns and ports may have all their liberties and free customs.” It is quite obvious that these “other towns” had taken no active part in the quarrel between the king and the barons, and that they derived no real profit from it.

But the merchants, it will be said, obtain substantial guarantees against arbitrary treatment. By article 20 Clauses concerning the merchants they are assured that their merchandise will not be confiscated, under the pretext of fines to be paid. According to article 41, they may go out of, come into and travel in England without paying exorbitant customs; in article 35 they are promised uniformity of weights and measures. All these concessions were in reality made in the interests of the barons. They saw clearly that the king, by inflicting ruinous fines on the merchants, diminished by so much, to the sole profit of his treasury, the wealth of the lordships to which the condemned men belonged.

1. As for the passage relating to the aids paid by the Londoners (see the text and what we have said above pp. 101 sqq.) it is very obscure. If this passage means, as some scholars have conjectured, that the aid ought to be reasonable, it is too vague to form a guarantee; if it means that every aid levied on the Londoners (except the three feudal aids) must be assented to by the Common Council of the realm, it will be observed that this Common Council, by the terms of article 14, includes only the barons, prelates and tenants-in-chief of the king. It is true that there were ‘barons’ of London in the Common Council (see Stubbs, p. 398). According to the list given by Matthew Paris (Chron. Maj. (Rolls series), ii, pp. 604–605), William Hardel, mayor of London, figures in the Committee of Twenty-five barons elected to keep the king under surveillance in conformity with article 61 of the Great Charter: “quod barones eligant viginti quinque barones de regno quos voluerint.”

Article 41, as the context proves, was merely designed to meet the case of the alien merchants who came to visit England to the great convenience of buyers, but were hated and hunted by the native producers. Similarly the uniformity of weights and measures, a reform well calculated to frustrate the frauds of the merchants, was desired by consumers only.

Stubbs wonders that the implements and working beasts of the serf should be exempted from arbitrary fines. But the text reads: 'Et villanus Clause touching the "wainage" of the villeins eodem modo amercietur salvo waynagio suo, si inciderint in misericordium nostram.' What does this engagement made by the king mean? It means that the "wainage" of a serf prosecuted before a royal tribunal shall not be confiscated; only serfs who do not belong to the king and fines imposed by royal officers are in question;¹ the guarantee is given not to the serfs but to the lords; the Charter only concerns itself with these serfs because their "wainage" is the lord's property. It does not protect them against the fines of seignorial courts. Moreover, it does not protect them against arbitrary tallage, and it is clearly specified that the securities relative to royal requisitions are granted only to freemen. Similarly the first article says: "Concessimus omnibus liberis hominibus regni nostri omnes libertates subscriptas. . . ." It might be queried whether the burgesses of the towns are included among the liberi homines; it is open to question; but that the serfs or villani (we have seen that these are equivalent terms in England in the thirteenth century) were in no wise liberi homines, and that by this very fact the great majority of the English population found itself excluded from the benefit of the Great Charter, is a fact which does not admit of doubt.

1. This is proved by the slightly different and more precise wording adopted in the confirmations of 1217 and of 1225: "Villanus alterius quam noster eodem modo amercietur, etc." (Bémont, p. 52). No security is granted to the villeins of the royal demesne; for the rest, their lot was in general better than that of the seignorial villeins.

It is undoubtedly from this standpoint that we must interpret article 60: "All these aforesaid customs and liberties which we have conceded to be observed in our kingdom in our relations with our men (ergo nostros), all those of our kingdom, as well clerk as lay, shall observe in their relations with their men (erga suos)."¹ This clause manifestly does not concern, as Thomson in his commentary thought, the whole of the English people, but only the freemen who did not hold their land directly from the king, and who also wished to be protected against the violence of their lords and the exactions of their agents. In order to understand article 60 we must compare it with article 15, in which the king declares that, just as he will not levy any extraordinary aid on his tenants-in-chief without the consent of the Common Council of the realm, in the same way he will no longer sell any writ authorising a lord to levy an aid on his free tenants (de liberis hominibus suis) beyond the three cases recognised by English custom. To sum up, besides the prelates, barons and tenants-in-chief of the king, the only class which obtains precise guarantees is the class of free tenants who are only mediately tenants of the king, and I imagine that this means only the freeholders holding by military service and not simple peasants holding in socage. It was the body of knights, direct and indirect vassals of the king, who had risen against him to obtain "liberties;" it was to them that the barons had made their appeal.¹ It was for them as well as for the barons that the Great Charter was drafted. The Great Charter was essentially a document of feudal law.

This being so, it is very difficult to believe that it contains some new political germ, and institutes the

1. It was probably in 1215 that an appeal was issued of which we have no more than the following mention: "Charta baronum Anglię missa tenentibus Northumbriam, Cumbriam, Westmorlandiam, contra Johannem regem Anglię" (Ayloffe, Calendar of Ancient Charters, 1774, p. 328).

The alleged consent to taxation

principle of consent to taxation. It is, moreover, the expression and the reflection of a social state in which taxation, properly speaking, is not known. At irregular intervals the king, who is supposed to content himself with the revenues of his demesne for his ordinary necessities, levies an extraordinary tax on some class or other of his subjects; for example, a feudal aid, notably under the form of "scutage," on the knights,—or a carucage on the other freeholders,—or a tallage on the peasants and towns of the crown. Is it said in the Great Charter that whatever may be the form which it takes "taxation" should be assented to? Not in the least. The authors of the True bearing of the text

compact are not acquainted, let us repeat, with "taxation" in general, and they wish solely to take cognisance of scutage or feudal aids: "That no scutage or aid¹ be established in our kingdom, unless it be to pay our ransom or for the knighting of our eldest son, or for the first marriage of our eldest daughter, and that in these three cases a reasonable aid only be levied." And to please the Londoners these words were added, the obscurity of which we have pointed out: "Let it be the same with regard to the aids of the City of London." Article 14 then specifies the rules for the summons of the Common Council, and, as Stubbs says, evidently does nothing but expressly

1. The barons bring together here, as if to confound them, the auxilium and the scutagium. The auxilium is the aid due to the suzerain in virtue of one of the most general principles of feudal law. In France, it is understood that the vassals cannot refuse the aid in the four cases: when the suzerain is a prisoner and put to ransom, or when he makes his son a knight, or when he marries his daughter, or when he sets out on the Crusade; in England this last case is not recognised by custom. The scutagium in the 12th century was generally a tax levied in lieu of military service, and such is the significance that modern historians, for the most part, give to scutage; but (1) the term might be applied differently, and might have, as early as this period, the general sense of a feudal aid; there are examples of aids in the three cases being called scutage; (2) John Lackland raised scutage which did not dispense from military service (see above, p. 56, note 1, and p. 125). The barons were then justified in assimilating the scutage to the aid.

confirm the previous custom. The king had not the right to levy a feudal aid by his own authority except in the three fixed cases; outside these three cases he had to consult his barons and tenants-in-chief. John Lackland had ignored this usage, or at least he had levied at his discretion, almost every year, a tax, the scutage, to which Henry II. had only resorted seven times and at a more moderate rate. The barons, as the wording of the clause proves, considered scutage as a sort of aid, and the uncertainty of terminology justified them in doing so. In any case the object of article 12 was to remind the king of the custom which regulated the feudal aid in the three cases, and to submit scutage expressly to the same restrictions. When John Lackland had disappeared, this clause was not reproduced in the confirmation of the Great Charter granted on the 12th of November, 1216. We must not conclude from this that the question had no importance in the eyes of the barons, for it was said in article 42 of that confirmation that, upon divers grave and doubtful clauses of the Great Charter, notably on the levy of scutages and aids, more ample deliberation was to be taken.¹ It was perhaps the assimilation of the scutage to the feudal aid in the three cases, which was contested by the king's advisers. However this may be, in the confirmations of 1217 and of 1225, clause 12 was replaced by the following one in which no mention is

Text adopted in the confirmations made of the feudal aid in the three cases :
 "That scutage be henceforth taken as it was accustomed to be taken in the time of King Henry II." ² This wording clearly proves that the barons had no idea of a parliamentary system, and only wished to be secured, in some way or other, against the too frequent return and the raising of the rate of scutage. Article 14 of the document of 1215, touching

1. "Quia vero quedam capitula in priori carta continebantur que gravia et dubitabilia videbantur, scilicet de scutagiis et auxiliis assidendis . . ." (Bémont, p. 58, n. 4).

2. Article 37 (Bémont, p. 57).

the summons of the Common Council is not to be found again in any of the confirmations, and our opinion is that it had been introduced into the Great Charter by desire of the king,¹ and not in the least by desire of the barons. The more so as it does not figure in the Articles of the Barons.

The Great Charter of 1215, as we see, was not a political statute, inaugurating constitutional guarantees unknown until then. On the other hand, far from being a national work, it was manifestly conceived in the interests of a class. What is to be our conclusion?

The Great
Charter is not a national work

Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Maitland, after having pointed out a great number of defects in the Great Charter, add: "And yet with all its faults this document becomes, and rightly becomes, a sacred text, the nearest approach to an irrevocable, 'fundamental statute' that England has ever had. For in brief it means this, that the king is and shall be below the law."² That again, it seems to us, is to assign too glorious a rôle to the baronage of John Lackland and to its political conceptions, which are childish and anarchical. The English nobility of that day has not the idea of law at all. Powerless to prevent the growth of a very strong royal power which has enveloped the country with the network of its administration and its courts, it seeks only to secure itself against financial exactions and the violence of a cruel and tyrannical king. It does not succeed in discovering, and it perhaps does not seek for

1. The end of the clause specifies that "the business should be transacted on the day assigned, by the counsel of those who are present, although all the persons summoned are not come." This is a precaution taken by the king against those who claimed only to pay the tax if they had consented to it in person, and the insertion of this rule is doubtless the principal motive which dictated the insertion of the article. No one, besides, thought that the consecrated usage of the Common Council could be abolished and when article 14 disappeared from the confirmations of the Great Charter, assemblies of barons and prelates continued none the less to be convoked.

2. History of English Law, i, p. 173.

Does not organise the reign of law

any "legal" means of controlling his acts and preventing abuses, it does not think of organising the "Common Council," it forgets even to speak of it in the Articles which it asks the king to accept. In order to force the king to respect his engagements, what expedient does it devise? The most naïf, the most barbarous procedure,

Appeal to civil war

the procedure of civil war: "The b̄arons shall elect twenty-five barons of the kingdom, who shall with all their power observe, keep and cause to be observed the peace and liberties granted," and in case of need, if the king refuse to repair the wrongs he has committed, "compel and molest him in every way that they can, by taking of his castles, of his lands and of his possessions" with the aid "of the commune of all the land," that is to say, with the aid of all those who are accustomed to bear arms. There is no question, in the Great Charter of John Lackland,¹ of the reign of law; it is merely a question of engagements taken by the king towards his nobles, respect for which is only imposed on him by the perpetual threat of rebellion.

The importance of the Great Charter is in reality due to its fullness, its comprehensiveness, to the variety of the problems which it attempts to solve.

Reasons of the constitutional importance of the Great
Charter

It does not differ fundamentally from the charters of liberties which preceded it in the twelfth century, but it is much more explicit. It is five times longer than that of Henry I., it regulates a much greater number of questions, and, being posterior to the capital reforms of Henry II., it is more adapted to the conditions of life and to the state of Law. In passing, and accessorily it enunciates in favour of chartered towns, the merchants and the seignorial villeins, certain promises of which there is no question in the documents conceded at their accession by Henry I., Stephen and Henry II.; although we must reduce the scope of these clauses to its just proportions, the share here assigned to civic liberties is evidently a new and striking fact. Finally, the Great Charter was the result of a celebrated crisis. The aristocracy in arms wrested it by main force from a prince as redoubtable by his intelligence as by his vices, and its publication was followed by a terrible civil war, which ended in its solemn confirmation. It thus became a symbol of successful struggle against royal tyranny: men have discovered in it, in the course of centuries, all sorts of principles of which its authors had not the least notion, and have made of it the "Bible of the Constitution."¹ False interpretations of some of its articles have not been without influence on the development of English liberties. There is no need to seek elsewhere the causes of its success in the Middle Ages and of its long popularity in modern times.

1. It is quite understood that our remarks cannot apply in their entirety except to the Great Charter of John Lackland. The clause respecting the twenty-five barons has disappeared from the Great Charter of 1225, which has a constitutional importance of the first order, while it is less interesting and less characteristic in the eyes of the historian than that of 1215.

1. Speech of William Pitt, quoted by Bémont, Chartes, p. lxix, note 1.

THE FOREST.

THE institution of the Forest, established by the Norman kings and maintained by the Plantagenets, has strong claims on the attention of the historian. Not only, as an institution very characteristic of the times, does it throw valuable light on certain features of mediæval society, law, and administration; but the fact of its existence led to important results in the constitutional crises of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. One may regard the Forest as a melancholy and decisive witness to the brutality of the Norman Conquest, as an illustration of the despotic authority of the Norman and Angevin kings, as a cause of the hostility of the barons and higher clergy towards the crown, or as a ground for the hatred felt by the people towards the king's officers. But from every point of view the Forest is equally worthy of study.

Stubbs did no more than touch upon the subject, and, as far as we know, the history of the Forest in mediæval England has never been treated in its entirety on the general lines which we wish to follow. Our intention is to set forth the most important of the results that have been achieved. We have used such printed records—whether published in full or calendared—as we have been able to consult, and several valuable works of modern scholarship, among which special mention should be made of Dr. F. Liebermann's critical essay on the Constitutiones de Foresta ascribed to Cnut, and

Mr. G. J. Turner's study on the Forest in its legal aspect during the thirteenth century. In addition, the interest of the task has led us to make cautious expeditions into the realm of comparative history. In seeking the origins of the English Forest we have turned to the Continent, where they are certainly to be found, and occasionally we have drawn a parallel between the evolution of the Forest in England and the corresponding process in France.

Use of the comparative method

(1)

THE FOREST AND THE RIGHT OF THE CHASE IN MEDIÆVAL ENGLAND.—
ORGANISATION OF THE FOREST.

We have first to ask what meaning was attached in England to the word "Forest," in its legal sense,¹ as used, for example, in the phrase "Forestas retinui" in the charter of Henry I, or in such expressions as "bosci afforestati," "manere extra forestam," which appear in the charter of 1217.

As early as the time of Henry II, Richard Fitz-Neal, in his Dialogus de Scaccario, gave a very clear definition of the Forest. It consists, he says, in preserves which the king has kept for himself in certain well-wooded counties where there is good pasture for the venison. There the king goes to forget his cares in the chase; there he enjoys quiet and freedom: consequently those who commit an offence against the Forest lay themselves open to the personal vengeance of the king. Their punishment is no concern of the ordinary courts, but depends entirely on the king, or his specially appointed delegate. The laws of the Forest spring "not from the common law of the realm, but from the will of princes; so that what is done in accordance with them is said not to be just absolutely, but just according to the forest law."² The nature of the Forest could not be more clearly stated, and the definitions given by Manwood in the sixteenth century and Sir Edward Coke in

1. The word is also used, even by lawyers, in its modern sense of a tract covered with trees; the author of the Dialogus de Scaccario writes, "Reddit compotum. . . de censu illius nemoris vel foreste. . . ." (Dialogus de Scaccario, II. xi; ed. Hughes, Crump, and Johnson, 1902, p. 141).

2. Dial. de Scacc. I. xi, xii; ed. cit. 105 sqq.

the seventeenth, are based on those formulated by Richard Fitz-Neal.¹

The word Forest, adds the author of the Dialogus, comes from fera, wild beast, e being changed to o.

The Forest is a hunting-preserve Fanciful though it be, this derivation is deduced from a perfectly correct notion : in law and in fact, if not in etymology, the Forest owed its origin to sport. The Forest or the Forests—the word was used, in the middle ages, in both the plural and the singular—consisted of a number of game-preserves protected by a special law. They were mostly covered with woods, but also included moorland, pasture, and even agricultural land and villages.²

In what sense does the Forest belong to the crown? The Forest, as such, belonged to the king. It must not, indeed, be confused with the royal demesne : for there were royal woods which were not Forest, and on the other hand, a forest often comprised estates which were the property of subjects, even of great lords.

But it belonged to the king in the sense that it was created for his benefit, that within its limits none save himself and those authorised by him might hunt the red deer, the fallow deer, the roe, and the wild boar,³ and

1. "A forrest doth chiefly consist of these foure things, that is to say, of vert, venison, particuler lawes and priviledges, and of certen meet officers appointed for that purpose, to thend that the same may the better be preserved and kept for a place of recreation and pastime, meet for the royall dignitie of a prince" (Manwood, Treatise of the Lawes of the Forrest, 1598, f. 1); "A Forest doth consist of eight things, videlicet of soil, covert, laws, courts, judges, officers, game, and certain bounds" (Coke, Fourth part of the Institutes of the Laws of England, ed. 1644, p. 289).

2. The word forestis, foresta, which is found in Merovingian documents of the seventh century, comes, according to Diez, from the Latin foris, and already meant a district placed outside, or preserved, by royal command. This etymology is quite in accordance with the sense of the word Forest in England, but after a careful study of Merovingian records, I am doubtful whether to accept it.

3. These four were generally considered to be the "beasts of the Forest" to which the forest law applied. The list varied somewhat in different times and places. See the very learned and sound paper of F. Liebermann, Ueber Pseudo-Cnuts Constitutiones de Foresta, 1894, p. 20; G. J. Turner, Select Pleas of the Forest (Selden Society, 1901), x sqq. From the time of the first Norman kings neither the wolf nor the fox was regarded as a beast of the forest. John of Salisbury says that they were not hunted according to the rules of venery (Liebermann, p. 23).

that it was subjected, throughout its extent, to very severe laws, enacted arbitrarily by the kings for the protection of the "vert and venison," that is to say for the preservation of the beasts of the Forest and the vegetation which gave them cover and food.¹

In mediæval documents mention is also made of the king's parks and warrens, and sometimes of his chase.

There was, in our opinion, no real difference between the king's chase and the Forest.²

Chases and royal parks Parks were distinguished by the fact that they were enclosed by a wall³ or fence.⁴ But the records published by Mr. Turner show that the royal parks formed part of the Forest,⁵ that they were under the oversight of foresters,⁶ and that offences committed in them were punished in the same way as forest offences:⁷ and in these respects isolated royal parks must have been in the same case as those surrounded by Forest. As the king's object in making a park was the better preservation of his game, it would be absurd if the forest law were not applicable to it. It is well to insist on this point, for English historians have vied with one another

1. If the king alienated a part of his Forest the forest law might still be applied to it for the benefit of the new owner. This was the case in the forests held by the earls of Lancaster in the fourteenth century (Turner, pp. ix, cxi sqq.). But as a rule the forest, in such an event, became a chase (see below, p. 154).

2. According to W. H. P. Greswell, Forests and Deer Parks of the County of Somerset (1905), p. 244, the chase was not subject to the forest law. He gives no proof of this, and admits that in certain documents the Forest of Exmoor is called the Chase of Exmoor. Kingswood Forest in Essex is another case in point. In 1328 J. le Warre complained that some years before the "gardeins de la chase" had put his manor "en la chase de Kingeswode et de Fulwode"; so that he no longer had the right to cut his wood (Rotuli Parliamentorum, ii, 29). Kingswood was part of the forest of Essex (Turner, p. 69). Mr. Turner's remarks on chases (ibid., pp. cix sqq.) apply only to the chases of feudal lords.

3. "Fregit murum parci et intravit eum cum canibus" (Turner, p. 40).

4. "Operarii in parco predicto ad reparandum palicium" (ibid., p. 55).

5. "Venacio data per dominum regem: . . . comes Cornubye venit in foresta de Rokingham . . . et cepit in parco et extra parcum bestias ad placitum. . . ." (ibid., p. 91).

6. "Willelmus, forestarius pedes in parco de Bricstoke" (ibid., p. 83). These foresters were sometimes styled parkers (ibid., p. 55).

7. Ibid., pp. 4, 54 sqq., etc.

in repeating that parks were not subject to the forest law.¹ In this general form, the statement is false: a distinction should be made between the royal parks and those of the lords.²

The position of the royal warrens has never, as it seems to me, been accurately stated. It is clear that the word bore another meaning than the one Royal warrens it had in France,³ and was applied especially to land reserved for hare-hunting. It would, however, be too much to say that royal warrens were entirely exempt from the forest law,⁴ for in the Placita foreste we find thefts of hares from a warren judged by the same process as poaching in the Forest.⁵ Even in Middlesex there was

1. See, e.g., W. S. Holdsworth, History of English Law (1903), i, 346; MacKechnie, Magna Carta (1905), p. 493.

2. The treatise of Mr. Turner, who possesses well-deserved authority on the subject of the forest law, does not tend to prevent this confusion. Although royal parks often appear in the documents he has edited, he deals in his introduction only with the parks of subjects. It is of these that he is speaking when he says (p. cxxii): "The park was not subject to the forest law."

3. In France itself the meaning of the word changed—a fact which has caused many blunders. It was only in the sixteenth century that "garenne" acquired the almost exclusive sense of rabbit-preserve. See the remarks of Olivier de Serres, Théâtre d'Agriculture, ed. 1805, II., 62 sqq. There were certainly "garennas à connins" in the Middle Ages, but the word "garenne" had the quite general meaning of "game preserve." See, among others, a document published in De Maulde, Condition forestière de l'Orléanais, p. 491: "... ius habendi garennam ad grossum animal"; and an arrêt of the Parlement of Paris, dated 1270, in Olim, I., 835, no. xlix: "... in loco ubi rex habet garennam suam ad grossam bestiam et minutam."

4. As Mr. MacKechnie asserts (Magna Carta, p. 493).

5. From the examples in the documents published by Mr. Turner, we have selected three of different periods: i. In 1209, in the pleas of the Forest held at Shrewsbury, Hamon Fitz-Marescat was tried for stealing hares in the warren of Bulridge (Turner, p. 10).—ii. In 1255: the offence was the theft of four hares in the warren of Somerton; the presentment was made by the verderers; the chief offender being a clerk of the king's court, the case was adjourned. The inquisition had been held in the ordinary way (pp. 41 sqq.). The title of the document from which this illustration is drawn runs: Placita foreste in comitatu Sumerset, and the sub-title: Placita de warrena de Sumerton. The document also summarises an inquisition held concerning a hare found dead, and conducted like inquisitions on beasts of the Forest found dead.—iii. In 1286: Placita Foreste apud Huntyndone. . . . Placita warrenne de Cantebrigge (pp. 129—131). This record is the most elaborate of the three, a warren which was entirely subject to the forest law.¹ Such cases were, however, exceptional. Offences against rights of warren had, as a rule, to be tried in the ordinary courts of law.

The question whether all the royal demesne was regarded as warren has been investigated by Mr. Turner, who concludes that the king would probably not consider his own lands to be warren unless they were sufficiently well stocked with game to make hunting worth while.² Nevertheless we find Edward I taking care to specify in 1305 that he had right of warren on all his demesne lands.³ From the beginning of the Norman period, moreover, private warrens had existed only by royal grant. It may safely be inferred from this that the king could claim right of warren over the whole realm. And as a matter of fact, he did establish warrens for himself in all parts: as late as the end of the thirteenth century he is found defending his right of warren in lands which did not belong to his demesne.⁴

In short, the king apparently claimed the right of the and also the most striking, for it certainly looks as if this Cambridge warren lay quite apart from any forest. Evidently a large number of arrears had to be cleared off and delicate points decided. The justices of the Forest, sitting at Huntingdon, tried a large number of cases of hare-poaching and gave decisions on claims put forward by the inhabitants. See below, n. 4.

1. In 1227 Henry III disafforested the warren of Staines, in Middlesex. His charter shows that the warren had been subject to the forest law (Turner, p. cviii; cf. Rot. Lit. Claus. II., 197).

2. Turner, p. cxxxiii.

3. Statutes of the Realm, i, 144.

4. We have a very characteristic document of 1286 concerning the royal warren at Cambridge: "Johannes Extraneus, dominus de Middilton, Warinus de Insula, dominus de Ramton, et templarii de Daneye clamant habere libertatem warrenne in terris suis infra warrenam predictam domini regis; et sepius cum leporariis suis ceperunt plures lepores in eisdem terris suis pro voluntate sua. . . . Ideo preceptum est vicecomiti quod faciat venire predictos Johannem et Warinum et eciam preceptorem ad ostendendum warantum si quod inde habeant, vel ad satisfaciendum domino regi de transgressione predicta . . ." (Turner, pp. 130—131.) See also (p. 131) the claim of the Abbot of Ramsey.

chase in every part of his realm.¹ In his view, this right entitled him to hunt small game, not only on the whole of his demesne, but also in the warrens which he had on the estates of his barons. But he preferred a nobler quarry, and so set apart for himself vast preserves for larger game. These were called Forests or Chases, and Parks when they were enclosed; and he established a code of forest law to protect them.

We now come to the hunting-rights possessed by the king's subjects. Apart from royal grants of the right to hunt in the Forest,² the barons and prelates had "chases," "parks," and "warrens" of their own. The chases of the lords were generally parts of the Forest which had been alienated by the king: in a sense the grant did not involve complete disafforestation, for the burdens imposed on the inhabitants were maintained, at least in part, for the benefit of the recipient.³ The parks of the lords, on

Hunting rights of the king's subjects

1. The matter is obscure, and in our opinion was a question of fact rather than of law. English writers on feudal law have tried to formulate theories about it. Blackstone asserts that all the game in the realm belongs to the king, and that nobody therefore may hunt without his permission. Christian, however, in his notes on Blackstone, cites documents which contradict this view, notably the following ancient pronouncements of English law: "Quant beastes savages le roye aler hors del forrest, le property est hors del roy . . . s'ilz sount hors del parke, capienti conceditur" (Blackstone, Commentaries, 17th ed., bk. II., cap. xxvii, n. 10).

The following passages leave the impression that contemporaries had rather vague notions as to the rights of the king over game which had strayed from forests and parks: "Quedam dama evasit de parco domini regis . . . et venit quidam homo domine Hugeline de Neville cum duobus leporariis, et prosequabatur dictam damam et cepit eam in campo de Pizeford, et duxit dictam venacionem secum in domo domine Hugeline. Set non possunt attachiari quia manent extra forestam." As an inquisition was held, it was evidently thought that an offence had been committed (Turner, p. 90, under the year 1250). "Dicunt per sacramentum suum quod homines comitis de Ferrariis fugaverunt unum brokettum dami infra libertatem usque ad aquam subtus Wodeford. Et brokettus ibi transivit aquam et resistit in quodam butimine extra Wodeford, et ibi custoditus fuit per villatam quousque Ricardus de Audewincle, viridarius, venit et per ipsum et per villatam ductus fuit ad forestam salvus et sanus" (ibid., p. 105, under the year 1252).

2. Numerous examples of these grants are to be found in the close rolls.

3. Turner, pp. cix sqq.

the other hand, though they were sometimes situated in districts which had formerly been forest, were not under the forest law. Provided that the king's hunting was not injured, a landowner was at liberty to make a park and hunt there at his pleasure.¹ Sometimes the king made a gracious present of bucks and does to stock a park.² As for the warrens in private hands, they were unenclosed tracts on a lord's demesne,³ where he hunted other game than the beasts of the Forest—hares in particular, but also rabbits, foxes, wild cats, partridges, pheasants, and so forth. If noble game, like a buck, took refuge in a warren, the hunters might follow it there from outside without restriction, for it was not a beast of the warren. Warrens, as we have already said, were established by royal charter. Thus the abbot and monks of Battle had right of warren on all their lands by charter of William the Conqueror: they alone, that is to say, might hunt the beasts of the warren. It was laid down in these charters, that every breach of the right of warren was punishable by a fine of ten pounds to the king.⁴

Outside these various preserves, royal and other, it appears that the chase was free in England during the middle ages. On this point the evidence, though naturally meagre, is sufficiently convincing.⁵ It was

1. Turner, pp. cxv sqq.

2. "Per breve, magister Simon de Wauton fecit capere in foresta de Rokingham octo damas et quatuor damos vivos, de dono domini regis, ad parcum suum instaurandum" (Anno 1253, ibid., p. 106).

3. The king was in general opposed to the "elargacio" of a seignorial warren over the lands of the lord's free tenants or the lands of his neighbours (Turner, p. cxxv).

4. Ibid., pp. cxxiii sqq.; cf. Rot. Parl. ii, 75 b.

5. As to lands where the chase was free, besides the documents cited by Turner (pp. cxxiii, n. 1, cxxviii, cxxx, cxxxiii) see Rot. Parl. i, 330a, no. 207, and in particular certain charters of disafforestation granted by John, notably the one in which he concedes the disafforestation of a district in Essex: "ita quod tota foresta infra predictas metas contenta et homines ibi manentes et heredes eorum sint deaforestati et liberi et soluti et quieti in perpetuum de nobis et heredibus nostris de omnibus que ad forestam et forestarios pertinent, et quod capiant et habeant omnimodam venationem quam capere poterint infra predictas metas" (Rot. Chartarum, ed. Hardy, p. 123. Cf. ibid., pp. 122, 128, 132, 206).

only at the end of the fourteenth century that the idea—long entertained by the nobility¹—of depriving the common people of the right to hunt game, made its appearance in English law.

In order to form an accurate estimate of the extent and validity of the grievances of the nation against the crown, future writers on the Forest will have to dispel the obscurity which surrounds this question of the right of the chase in England. And with their treatment of the Forest they must combine that of the warrens, just as the two are connected in article 48 of the Great Charter.²

We come now to a subject which is better known—the organisation of the Forest at the time of its highest development, that is, during the rule of the first Plantagenets. Stubbs dealt with the subject;³ but Mr. Turner's excellent study has given us more exact knowledge and corrected certain mistakes. From it we have drawn most of the short sketch which follows, and the reader may be referred to it for all that concerns the details of forest procedure.

Nobody had the right, without royal permission,⁴ to take any of the game, wood, or pasture of the Forest—not even the baron or freeholder on his own land, if that land lay within the bounds of a forest. "Those who dwell within the Forest," writes the author of the Dialogus de Scaccario, "do not take of their own wood, even for the necessities of their house, except under the view of those who are appointed to keep the Forest."⁵ The right of cutting

Importance of the question of the right of the chase

The forest organisation

The protection of the Forest

1. Cf. Liebermann, Pseudo-Cnut, pp. 45, 47.

2. "Omnes male consuetudines de forestis et warennis, et de forestariis et warennariis . . ."

3. Const. Hist., vol. i (ed. 1903), pp. 434 sqq.

4. For authorisations to make clearings or enclosures, and the preliminary inquiries, see W. R. Fisher, Forest of Essex, pp. 321-2. On permission to take game see below, pp. 187-188.

5. Dialogus, I. xi, pp. 102-3.

Trespasses to the vert :
waste, assart,
and purpresture

wood, whether for fuel or making repairs, was narrowly restricted: anyone who exceeded his customary rights committed the crime of "waste" (vastum); he had to pay a composition in order to keep the wood he had cut, and was amerced whenever the itinerant justices came round, until the damaged trees had grown to their former state. If trees were uprooted to turn woodland into arable or merely to gain a few square feet of soil, a fine was inflicted; and though the offender was not required to plant other trees, he had to pay a composition on every crop raised on this "assart." This system of converting a punishment into an annual rent and an offence into a permanent source of revenue is extremely characteristic. The chase was certainly the parent of the Forest, but it is nevertheless true that this institution quickly acquired a financial significance:¹ the king was even more concerned to secure an income at the expense of the inhabitants of the Forest than to prevent the destruction of wood. Furthermore, there was the crime of "purpresture," committed whenever, by enlarging a field, making a mill or a fishpond, a hedge or a ditch, anyone encroached on the domain of the king's deer or restricted their movements.² The offender was fined, and might only keep the land he had gained, or the works he had constructed, by payment of a further

Trespasses
to the venison

sum. As for the destruction of game, it was punished more or less severely, according to the period, and it was guarded against by vexatious rules to which we shall return later.

1. [Much welcome light is thrown on forest finance by Miss Margaret L. Bazeley in her recently-published monograph, The Forest of Dean in its Relations with the Crown during the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries (Transactions of the Bristol and Gloucestershire Archæological Society, vol. xxxiii, pp. 153 sqq.). It appears that the financial resources of this forest were not properly exploited until the 13th century.]

2. Porprestura has the general meaning of "encroachment," "usurpation." See the passage from Glanvill cited by Du Cange, s.v. porprendere. A clear distinction was not always made between the offence of "assart" and that of "purpresture."

The supervision of the Forest and the punishment of offences were provided for by a complicated system of officials and institutions—functionaries appointed by the king, commissioners and jurors chosen by election, officers who held their posts by hereditary right, investigations by commissions of enquiry, local courts, and eyres of itinerant justices.

The forest officials

At the head of the forest administration we find the capitalis forestarius mentioned in the charter of 1217, or else two high dignitaries, who in the thirteenth century had the title of justices. From 1238 onward, it was usual for the Forest to be administered in this way by two justices, one for the district north, the other for that south, of the Trent.¹

The head of the administration

Each of the forests, or each group of forests, was administered by an official who was called warden, bailiff, seneschal, or chief forester.² His post was sometimes hereditary,³ but even in this case he might be removed. When the warden was appointed by letters patent, the same document often conferred on him the custody of the castle of the district.⁴

The wardens

Besides the warden, there were in most of the large forests one or more forestarii de feodo, foresters de fé, who likewise saw to the preservation of the vert and the venison, and executed the decisions of the itinerant justices. They

The foresters-in-fee

1. Turner, pp. xiv sqq. [Mr. Turner has printed a list of the justices of the forests south of the Trent (1217-1821) in Eng. Hist. Rev. 1903, pp. 112-116.]

2. Turner, pp. xvi sqq. On the rights possessed by the wardens see ibid., pp. 66-7, and the passage quoted in the Introduction, p. xxi, n. 1. Cf. an interesting document of the fourteenth century (Rot. Parl. ii, 79).

[In the French the official under discussion is termed the chef-forestier. Following Mr. Turner (Intro., p. xvi) I shall refer to him as the "warden."]

3. As in the case of John Fitz-Nigel, whose duties and rights were determined by an inquisition of 1266. In return for the profits which were guaranteed to him, he paid the king forty shillings a year and kept the forest of Bernwood (Turner, pp. 121-2).

4. Turner, Intro., p. xvii. [See also Miss Bazeley's excellent account of the rights and duties of the warden in the Forest of Dean (op. cit. pp. 175-191).]

possessed certain rights over the Forest. Some, but not all, paid a ferm to the king.¹ They were not always bound to obey the warden.² Some, without doubt, had been enfeoffed by the king, and owed submission to him only; others had been enfeoffed by the warden.³ Occasionally a whole forest would be put under the custody of a forester-in-fee; his office would then be merged in that of warden. An instance was the office of forester-in-fee of the forests of Somerset, which was held in the fourteenth century by the family of Mortimer.⁴

The ordinary foresters were game-keepers who pursued and arrested offenders. A distinction is often made between mounted foresters and under-foresters who went on foot.⁵ They were chosen by the wardens, or, in some districts, by the foresters-in-fee, but they took an oath of fidelity to the king. There were also private foresters, called woodwards, who guarded the woods held by subjects within the limits of the Forest: they were bound by oath to preserve the vert and venison for the king's hunting; and if they failed to do so, the wood was confiscated. Each forest, moreover, had as Agisters a rule four agistatores, charged with the oversight of the agistment of the cattle and swine in the

1. Turner, pp. xxiii-iv, only touches upon the question of foresters-in-fee. Interesting details will be found in Greswell, Forests of Somerset, pp. 136 sqq. In Fleta, a legal treatise written about 1290, there are curious rules for the conduct of inquisitions concerning foresters-in-fee (Fleta, lib. ii. c. 41, § 30). [Miss Bazeley gives some particularly interesting information about the nine foresters-in-fee of the Forest of Dean (pp. 191 sqq.). See especially p. 194, where their possessions and obligations are tabulated. All paid an annual ferm to the king; but in the thirteenth century they could assert no warrant for their jurisdiction "nisi antiqua tenura."]

2. A warden, Henry Sturmy, declared in 1334 that all the forestarii de feodo in his forest owed him obedience (Rot. Parl. ii. 79). This was therefore not the invariable rule.

3. "Hugo de Stratford, quondam forestarius de feodo de balliva de Wakefeud, reddidit per annum domino Johanni de Nevyle, tunc senescallo foreste, pro predicta balliva, ad firmam, duas marcas et dimidiam," etc. (Turner, p. 123).

4. Greswell, pp. 150 sqq.

5. Fisher, Forest of Essex, p. 137; Greswell, p. 144.

woods and fields, and with the collection of the rents exacted for pasturage.¹

The verderers belong to another class. They were knights or substantial landowners who had property in the Forest. They were elected in the county court, generally to the number of four in each forest, to attend the forest courts of justice. Once elected, they as a rule retained office for life.² Finally, the regards were sworn knights,³ charged with a temporary commission of enquiry. The functions of the verderers and regards can best be understood by an examination of the working of the forest courts.⁴

Stubbs' sketch of the administration of justice in the Forest⁵ is rather meagre and even wanting in accuracy.

The swanimote, which he represents as a court of justice corresponding to the county court, was only an assembly of the foresters, held to make arrangements about the pasture, to receive the rents which it brought in, and to take precautions against injury to the deer during the fawning season.⁶ There were really only two kinds of tribunals—the court of attachment, attachiam-entum, held as a rule in each forest every six weeks, and the court of the itinerant justices of the forests, justiciarii itinerantes ad placita foreste, who held an eyre in each forest every few years. The functions of the court of attachment were rather

1. Turner, pp. xx sqq., xxiv sqq., xxvi. Du Cange, s.v. agistare.

2. Turner, pp. xix-xx, xxvi.

3. [Turner, pp. lxxv sqq.]

4. In regard to the following section, see the details given by Coke, Fourth Institute, ed. 1644, ch. lxxiii, pp. 289-320; Turner, pp. xxvii sqq. A very clear summary is given by W. S. Holdsworth, History of English Law, i, 342 sqq.

5. Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. 437 sqq.

6. This appears clearly from § 8 of Henry III's Charter of the Forest. The misapprehension as to the nature of the swanimote originated with Manwood; cf. Turner, pp. xxvii sqq. The term "swanimote" is, however, sometimes applied to the courts of attachment and to the forest inquisitions.

administrative than judicial.¹ Only minor trespasses against the vert were punished there: people who had cut boughs, for instance, might be sentenced to a fine of a few pence. Important cases concerning the vert, and all concerning the venison, went before the justices in eyre.

We must now glance at the preliminary proceedings in the cases which were brought before the itinerant justices. When the offender was not caught in the act by the foresters, there were several types of inquisition by which he might be discovered. As early as the twelfth century and perhaps before, there took place every three years the visitatio nemorum or "regard."² The regards were twelve knights, appointed by the sheriff at the instance of the king. This commission of enquiry had to visit the Forest and investigate any offences that had been committed, basing their procedure on a list of questions which were called "chapters of the regard."³ The chief chapters were those on assart, waste, and purpresture: others concerned the pasture on the demesne, the eyries of falcons and hawks, honey, forges and mines,⁴ harbours,⁵ the weapons and dogs of the inhabitants of the Forest.

1. Attachiamentum was the obligation to appear. The court of attachment was so called because its chief function was to "view the attachments" made by the foresters. "Et praeterea singulis annis quadraginta diebus per totum annum convenient viridarii et forestarii ad videndum attachiamenta de foresta, tam de viridi quam de venacione, per presentationem ipsorum forestariorum et coram ipsis attachiatis" (Charter of the Forest, § 8). At this court the attachments were enrolled, and the offenders found sureties for their appearance before the itinerant justices. Notwithstanding § 8 of the charter, Mr. Turner (pp. xxxv-vi) holds that as a rule the nomination of sureties was performed in the court of attachment only for trespasses against the vert, and not for those against the venison. See also p. xl.

2. "Imminente visitatione nemorum, quam regardam vulgo dicunt, que tertio anno fit . . ." (Dial. de Scacc. l. xi).

3. Turner, pp. lxxv-vi, mentions several versions of the chapters of the regard.

4. Because wood was needed to work forges and mines.

5. The records furnish instances of wood being stolen in a forest near the sea, and put on shipboard.

The special inquisition As for poaching, at least from the beginning of the thirteenth century, and probably before, it was the occasion of special inquisitions which involved the whole countryside in trouble. If a beast of the Forest was found dead, an inquisition to discover the offender must be held by the four townships nearest the spot.

Poachers detected by the inquisition of the four townships, or surprised in the fact, were generally kept under arrest until they had found sureties for their appearance before the justices in eyre. In this way they sometimes spent a year or more in gaol. Persons accused of trespasses to the vert might also, in certain cases, be kept in detention.¹

Imprisonment and pledges The visitations of the justices were arranged by royal writ, nominating justiciarii itinerantes to hear and determine the pleas of the Forest in a particular county or group of counties. In the twelfth century the eyres occurred once in three years, since the regards took place at that interval and were held in view of the coming of the justices. In the time of Henry III they occurred about every seven years, like the eyres of crown pleas and common pleas; and the intervals between them became longer and longer.² The justices were persons of some eminence. One of the two Justices of the Forest was always of their number.

Frequency of the eyre 1. On this last point, see the details given by Turner, pp. xxiii sqq. According to the Assize attributed to Edward I, offenders against the vert were not liable to arrest and imprisonment until after their third "attachiammentum." (For the meaning of this word, see above.) "Post tercium attachiammentum corpus debet attachiari et retineri" (Statutes, i. 243). As a matter of fact, the itinerant justices of Edward I gave instructions in conformity with this rule: see the Provisions of the justices, at Nottingham, in 1287 (Turner, p. 63). Cf. the Assizes of Henry II and Richard I, cited below.

2. [See Miss Bazeley's list of eyres in Gloucestershire during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries (op. cit. p. 214). They were more frequent under Henry II than afterwards, though even at this early time, the intervals between them varied greatly. With respect to the thirteenth century, the list confirms the generalisations in the text.]

The itinerant justices dealt separately with the pleas of the vert and the pleas of the venison. The presentment was made by the foresters and verderers, not by a regular jury. The report of the inquisition was generally taken as sufficient proof of the facts; and it was seldom that the townships which had made the inquisition were required to come and confirm the evidence orally. In the thirteenth century convicted delinquents were fined, and if they did not pay, were sent back to prison till they found the money. If anyone cited failed to appear, he was summoned in the county court, and if he remained contumacious, was outlawed.

Procedure at the forest eyre

Punishments inflicted

To give a clear impression of the effects of this system of administration, it would be necessary to draw a map of the Forest at the beginning of the thirteenth century. In the present state of our knowledge this is impossible. But there is no doubt that the Forest comprised a good part of the realm. Foreigners and travellers noted with astonishment its enormous extent. The Italian Polydore Vergil, who crossed the Channel at the beginning of the sixteenth century, asserted that a third of England consisted of parks and forest, and a century later Moryson could still write that there were more deer in England than in all the rest of Europe.¹ The statement of Polydore Vergil is evidently a serious exaggeration, for it refers to a period subsequent to extensive disafforestments. But it might not be far from the truth if applied to the beginning of the thirteenth century. At that time indeed, before the disafforestments carried out by John, Henry III, and the three Edwards, there were only six counties out of thirty-nine which contained no Forest.² These consisted of a compact group of counties corresponding to the

1. Authorities cited by Greswell, p. 242.
2. Cf. the lists of counties in Parl. Writs, ed. Palgrave, i. 90-1, 396-7; and Turner, pp. xcvi n. 1, xcvi n. 3, xcix sqq., ciii n. 5, cvi sqq.

ancient East Anglia and its marches—Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, Bedfordshire, and Hertfordshire.¹ In another quarter there was Kent, to which one might, strictly speaking, add Middlesex.² In Kent, Norfolk and Suffolk, more than anywhere else, the rural population maintained its freedom after the Conquest,³ and these were precisely the districts free from the forest law. On the other hand, thirty-three counties, representing six-sevenths of the area of the realm, contained forests, often of great extent. Essex, which was indeed an exceptional case, was entirely forest in the days of Henry I and Henry II.⁴

We can imagine the result of the state of things just described. The forests swarmed with game, and even in time of famine it was unlawful to touch it.

Effects of the forest system : It had freedom and protection, and might
i. economic ravage the crops without fear of arrows.

The very owners of the soil were forbidden to make clearings, on pain of fines and yearly compositions. A tenant was not allowed to follow his own wishes in the development of his land, even to the extent of making a hedge or ditch. The ancient customary rights which had formerly ensured to the Saxon peasant many advantages and some prosperity, were now pretexts for the infliction of fines; at a time when the cultivation of forage-crops was seldom practised, the law forbade the use of the grass-land and woods for the feeding of cattle; and one might not cut down a tree or a bough on one's own property, except under the surveillance of the all-powerful forester, with his vexatious restrictions and demands. It was within his power to make a family's

1. It is, however, not quite certain that the three last contained no forest. See on this Turner, p. cviii.

2. As we have seen, Middlesex contained a warren, which was under the forest law. It was suppressed in 1227 (Turner, p. cviii). There was no forest properly so called in the county.

3. Vinogradoff, Villainage in England, pp. 205 sqq., 218 sqq., 316.

4. J. H. Round, Forest of Essex, in the Journal of the British Archaeological Association, new series, iii, 39.

lot intolerable, and in the event of opposition, to summon its members time after time before the court of attachment and ruin them by countless fines.

It was not only in the economic sphere that the forest law made its effects felt. From a legal and political standpoint, the forests were a dangerous anomaly. They were withdrawn from the operation of the common law and of the custom of the realm, and governed by rules laid down in special assizes and ordinances. In them, too, there lived troops of royal officers, who alone were allowed to bear arms and who were pledged by oath to serve the interests of the king. The Forest was the stronghold of arbitrary power.

Such was the character of the Forest at the time of its greatest extent and influence. We thought it best to begin by describing it : we have now to account for its existence, and to trace its history from its rise to its decline. We shall be concerned in particular to show how the Forest, a natural outcome of the Conquest, became perhaps the most oppressive and the most hated of the institutions which the Norman and Angevin kings sought to impose on their subjects, and how it consequently strengthened the hostility of the barons, and furthered the union of the English against the despotic power of the crown.

ORIGIN OF THE FOREST. DEVELOPMENT OF THE SYSTEM UNDER THE FIRST THREE NORMAN KINGS.

Like all the rulers of their time, the Anglo-Saxon kings loved the chase and possessed game-preserves. They did not, however, establish a forest jurisdiction, with an administrative organisation, courts, and special laws.¹ It was from the continent that the forest system came, and it was the Norman conquerors who brought it over. It is in Frankish and Norman records that its origin should have been sought by English historians.²

No one can study the Carolingian capitularies which relate to the Forestis without being struck by the analogy or rather the clear connection which exists between them and the English Assizes of the Forest. Under Charles the Great and his immediate successors, the Forest was essentially a royal institution. The wood and the game were protected by "forestarii," and "if the king has given to any man one or more beasts in the Forest, he ought not to take more than has been given."³ This Frankish institution of the Forestis did not disappear with the Carolingians. In the tenth and eleventh centuries the dukes and counts among whom Gaul was divided evidently revived it to their own advantage in all districts where there was plenty of wood

1. Liebermann, Ueber Pseudo-Cnuts Constitutiones de Foresta, pp. 14 sqq. Details in regard to Anglo-Saxon hunting will be found in Greswell, op. cit., pp. 24 sqq.

2. See (in the recently-published Mélanges dedicated to M. Charles Bémont) an essay in which we devote special attention to the Franco-Norman Origins of the English Forest. A German scholar, Herr Hermann Thimme, has argued that the Frankish Forest consisted of arable and pastoral lands from which the inhabitants of the "mark" were excluded. (Forestis, Königsgut, und Königsrecht, in the Archiv für Urkundenforschung, vol. ii, 1909, pp. 101-154). This paradox, we think, has been completely refuted in an essay which we have just written, and which we hope to publish in the Bibliothèque de l'Ecole des Chartes.

3. Boretius, Capitul, i, 172; see also pp. 86 sqq., 98, 291; vol. ii, 355.

and game. At all events, the dukes of Normandy had a Forest before the conquest of England.

Norman records of the eleventh century are meagre and scarce. They suffice to prove, however, that in certain woods, and even in woods granted by the duke to his subjects, larger game, such as the red-deer, roe, and wild-boar, was reserved for the duke's hunting, and the trees might be neither felled nor cut.¹ There were pleas of the Forest² and a forest law, and in the reign of duke Richard II the peasants rebelled in the hope of securing the free use of the woods and waters, in spite of the jus ante statutum.³

When sources become more plentiful, at the beginning of the twelfth century, we find the administration of the Norman Forests very similar to the administration of those in England.⁴ It is true that, by the time from which our authorities date, Normandy might have taken in her turn certain institutions which had sprung up in England. But in any case the beginnings of the Forest are prior to the union of Normandy and England; the Forest was a Frankish, not an Anglo-Saxon institution; and it was carried across the Channel by William I.

The forest system, introduced into England by a victorious dynasty which from the first was very powerful, soon made remarkable advances in this country. As we said in our study on the origins of the manor, the Norman Conquest was no passing storm for the

Brutal character of the Norman conquest

1. Charter of William the Conqueror for St. Etienne of Caen; Delisle, Cartulaire normand, no. 326.

2. Duke Robert's charter to Cerisy: Dugdale, Monasticon, ed. 1846, vii. 1073.

3. Guill. de Jumièges, V. ii. in Duchesne, Hist. Normann. Scriptores, p. 249. See also the Cartulaire de St. Michel du Tréport, ed. Laffleur de Karmaingant, no. 10.

4. See the studies by Leopold Delisle, Des revenus publics en Normandie au xii^e siècle, Bibl. Ec. Chartes, vol. xi (1849); Etude sur la condition de la classe agricole en Normandie, (1851); M. Michel Prevost's monograph, Etude sur la forêt de Roumare, Bull. de la Soc. d'émulation du Commerce et de l'Industrie de la Seine-Infér., 1903 (published separately, 1904); and also my study referred to above, p. 166, n. 2.

vanquished. Confiscations were numerous, and the small Saxon freeholder received a mortal blow.¹ This general estimate, which we adopt on the authority of the most learned students of the eleventh century, justifies us in regarding as probable and natural the accounts of chroniclers concerning the establishment of the Forest in England. The event which most im-

The creation of the New Forest pressed contemporaries was the making of the New Forest in Hampshire.² As everyone knows, William Rufus was killed by an arrow while hunting. Florence of Worcester, who died in 1118, declares that his fate was a stroke of divine vengeance, punishing the son for a sin committed by the father. For William the Conqueror, he says, to make the New Forest, had ruined a hitherto prosperous country, driven out the inhabitants, and destroyed houses

Discussion of Florence of Worcester's account and churches.³ Later writers have enlarged on the same theme. Quite recently, however, the late Mr. F. H. M. Parker has called this story into question. According to him, William Rufus was the victim of a conspiracy: Henry I's complicity was not beyond doubt: and the story about divine vengeance was invented to remove suspicion.⁴ Long ago the worthy David Hoiard, in his commentary on Littleton, affirmed in his academic style that William the Conqueror "did not resort to the excesses which some English historians cast in his teeth," and that it was "the monks" who gave him his bad reputation.⁵ No purpose would be served here by a detailed discussion of Parker's article, sound as many of his comments are. It is enough to point out that Florence

1. See above, pp. 21 sqq.

2. See the details given by Freeman, History of the Norman Conquest, iv. 611 sqq.

3. Florence of Worcester (ed. Thorpe, Eng. Hist. Soc.), ii. 44-5.

4. The Forest Laws and the Death of William Rufus (Engl. Hist. Rev., 1912, pp. 26 sqq.).

5. Anciennes loix des François conservées dans les coutumes angloises recueillies par Littleton (ed. 1766), i. 448.

of Worcester wrote too soon after the creation of the New Forest to risk so flagrant a falsehood, and that, even on the theory of a conspiracy, such a lie would have been very clumsy. William Rufus was universally hated, regarded as an enemy to God and man; if, as Parker supposes, there was a political motive for the circulation of a story of divine vengeance, it would have sufficed to recall the crimes and extortions of Rufus himself, and it was as clumsy as dangerous to assert facts which the enemies of the new king could have disproved. Finally, Henry I was himself a great hunter, and if Florence had been trying to please him, he would certainly have taken care not to represent the creation of the New Forest as a crime. His denunciations can therefore only be explained on grounds altogether opposed to those suggested by Mr. Parker. If, while on the subject of the death of Rufus, he brought in the ravages perpetrated by William the Conqueror, it was because contemporaries really remembered them, and connected the misdeeds of the father with the violent death of the son.

There is reason, however, for regarding the statement of Florence as an exaggeration. It has been shown that the district afforested in Hampshire was by no means entirely an inhabited and cultivated country. I am not speaking of the negative argument put forward by archæologists, who have found no traces of pre-Norman villages in this region: archæological arguments are only convincing when positive. But there is the evidence of Domesday Book, which has been examined by Mr. Baring. It shows that William I found in a corner of Hampshire 75,000 acres of almost deserted country, and of this he made a forest. He added, however, fifteen or twenty thousand acres of inhabited land, on which there were a score of villages and a dozen hamlets; and doubtless through fear of poaching, he evicted five hundred families, numbering about two thousand

Evidence of Domesday Book regarding the New Forest

persons. Later, the New Forest was further increased by between ten and twenty thousand acres, which were mainly covered with wood and thinly populated.¹

William the Conqueror and his sons, therefore, made forests at their pleasure, without troubling much about the distress they caused. Of the utterly

Arbitrary policy of the Norman kings

arbitrary nature of their policy, we may give another illustration, reported at an inquisition in a most naïve and certainly most sincere style. While travelling through Leicestershire, Henry I saw five hinds in Riseborough wood: he decided to afforest the wood, and left one of his servants to guard the game, the office afterwards passing to a Leicestershire man who held land in the neighbourhood. The wood in question was in a populous and cultivated district.² The famous articles concerning the forests in

Continual growth of the Forest

the Forest continued to grow during the reigns of the first three Norman kings.³

Under Henry I, the whole of Essex was subject to the forest law, including the hundred of

1. Baring, The Making of the New Forest (Engl. Hist. Rev., 1901, pp. 427 sqq.; 1912, pp. 513 sqq.) [The first article also separately in his Domesday Tables (1909), pp. 194—203.]

2. The inquisition was made in the reign of Henry III; the document is curious in more than one respect: "Cum rex Henricus primus . . . iturus fuisset versus partes aquilonares, transivit per quendam boscum, qui vocatur Riseberwe, qui boscus est in comitatu Leycestrie; et ibi vidit quinque bissas; qui statim precepit cuidam servienti suo nomine Pichardus quod in partibus illis moraretur usque ad reditum suum a partibus predictis et dictas bissas interim ad opus suum custodiret. Contigit autem quod infra annum illum dictus rex ibi non rediit; infra quem annum dictus Pichardus associavit se cuidam servienti eiusdem patrie, qui vocabatur Hascullus de Athelakeston, ad cuius domum sepius conversabatur. Finito vero anno illo, postquam predictus rex rediit a partibus aquilonaribus, adiit dictus Pichardus regem predictum, dicens se nolle amplius ballivam predictam custodire. Et tunc requisitus ab ipso rege quis esset idoneus ad dictam ballivam custodiendam, respondit dicens quod dictus Hascullus, qui terras ibidem habuit vicinas et manens erat in eadem balliva. Et tunc dictus rex commisit Hascullo predicto dictam ballivam custodiendam scilicet forestariam de comitatu Leycestrie et similiter Rotelandie, qui eam custodivit toto tempore suo" (Turner, p. 45).

3. See the passages quoted in Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. 435, notes 1 and 2.

Tendring, which was afterwards disafforested.¹ Henry I's contemporary, Ordericus Vitalis, asserts that he "claimed for himself the hunting of the beasts of the Forest in all England and hardly granted to a small number of nobles and friends the privilege of coursing in their own woods."² This is unquestionably a gross exaggeration.³ What is proved by this passage is that, as other documents show, Henry extended the bounds of the Forest, and thus restricted the exercise of the right of hunting by reserving it to himself in lands which did not belong to the royal demesne. His object was to secure for himself the possession of huge game-preserves, and at the same time, no doubt, a substantial income of fines for forest offences.⁴

It is impossible, in the present state of our knowledge, to estimate the territorial extent of the Forest reign by reign. Nor is it much more possible to trace accurately the growth of the forest law and organisation. The records are so scanty, so vague, sometimes so difficult to date, that no indisputable conclusions can be reached. I am inclined to think that, in its essential features, the forest law was already formulated in Normandy before the Conquest and that William I established "the peace of his beasts"⁵ on lines which were in general followed

The forest law under William I and William II

1. On the extent of the Forest in Essex, see Round, The Forest of Essex, in the Journal of the British Archaeological Association, new series, iii. 37 sqq.

2. Ordericus Vitalis, ed. Aug. le Prevost, iv. 238.

3. Cf. the charter granted by Henry I to the citizens of London, in fine: "Et cives habeant fugationes ad fugandum, sicut melius et plenius habuerunt antecessores eorum, scilicet Ciltre et Middlesex et Sureie" (Sel. Charters, ed. H. W. C. Davis, pp. 129 sqq.).

4. Mr. Round, who emphasises strongly the fiscal character of the enlargement of the Forest, thinks that in the vast preserve constituted by the county of Essex, the kings seldom hunted outside the district of Waltham (Forest of Essex, p. 39).

5. This is stated by the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (ed. Thorpe, i. 355). From William I's letter to the Londoners, forbidding them, unless individually authorised by the archbishop to chase the red-deer, roe, or any other game in Lanfranc's manor of Harrow, it is clear that besides the king, there were already subjects with special hunting rights. See J. H. Round's edition of this charter (Londoners and the Chase, in the Athenæum, 30 June, 1894, p. 838).

to the death of Henry I. The "baronies of the Forest" which he established for instance in Somerset, were no doubt instituted for purposes of political supervision, but they were also the origin of foresterships-in-fee which are found in existence in the next century.¹

William Rufus unquestionably had officers who protected the game, made enquiry into encroachments, and imposed fines for trespasses against the venison, even in lands which were not part of the demesne.² In this reign the forest administration seemed so intolerable to small landowners and to the Saxon peasants, that William, to win their help against the rebellious Normans, promised, among other delusive concessions, to give up his forests; and with this hope before them, they supported him faithfully.³

We have rather more information as to the organisation of the Forest under Henry I. We must not indeed accept without hesitation the authority of the so-called Leges Henrici Primi. Dr. Liebermann, who has studied the collections of twelfth-century laws with great learning and insight, sees in them no more than traces of the legislation of Henry I.⁴ He admits,⁵ however, that, as the compiler states,⁶ the Forest was reckoned as an appurtenance of the crown in the time of Henry I, and the seventeenth chapter of the Leges, composed of heads of chapters which summarise the powers of the forest courts, he considers to be a fragment of the instructions given by Henry to his justices of the Forest.⁷ It appears Documents of the reign of Henry I.

The "Leges Henrici primi"

1. A baronia Foreste, held of William I per servicium Foreste, was the origin of the office of forester-in-fee in Somerset (Greswell, pp. 42 sqq., 85).

2. See the passages cited by Liebermann, Ueber Pseudo-Cnuts Constitutiones de foresta, p. 21.

3. See the passages cited in Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. 321-2.

4. Liebermann, op. cit. p. 23.

5. Ibid.

6. "De iure regis. Hec sunt iura que rex Anglie solus et super omnes homines habet in terra sua . . . Foreste" (Leges Hen. primi, cap. x, § 1; in Liebermann, Gesetze der Angelsachsen, i. 556).

7. Pseudo-Cnut, p. 23.

from this chapter¹ that the holders of lands under the forest law were exposed to countless annoyances: the right of making clearings, of putting up buildings, of cutting wood, of carrying weapons, of keeping dogs, was already denied them or was subject to most irksome restrictions: they had to attend the forest courts when summoned, and to act as beaters when the king went hunting.

Authentic documents of the time of Henry I, such as charters and the pipe roll, confirm the impression made by this chapter of the Leges and point to its trustworthiness. The charters show that the king had a staff of foresters, called venatores, servientes, ministri,² who not only had oversight of the royal Forest, but also strove to enlarge it, made themselves troublesome to the neighbouring landowners, and prevented them from hunting on their own estates and clearing their land.³ The Charter of the Forest of 1217 proves that the "regard" was known in the days of Henry I, since, according to the fifth article, the "regarders" went "through the forests to make the regard at the time of the first coronation of Henry II"; and they had certainly not been instituted during the period of anarchy which followed Henry I's death.⁴

1. It runs as follows: "De Placito Forestarum. Placitum quoque forestarum multiplici satis est incommoditate vallatum: de essartis; de cesione; de combustione; de venacione; de gestacione arcus et iaculorum in foresta; de misera canum expeditacione; si quis ad stabilitam non venit; si quis pecuniam suam reclusam dimisit; de edificiis in foresta; de summonicionibus supersessis; de obviacione alicuius in foresta cum canibus; de corio vel carne inventa" (Liebermann, Gesetze, i. 559).

2. See the address of a charter of Henry I granting to the monastery of Abingdon the tithe of the venison taken in Windsor Forest: "Willelmo filio Walteri, et Croco venatori, et Ricardo servienti, et omnibus ministris de foresta Windesores" (Historia monasterii de Abingdon, ed. J. Stevenson, ii. 94).

3. "Henricus, rex Anglie, Croco venatori, salutem. Permite lucrari terram monachorum Abbandone de Civelea et de Ualingeforda, illam scilicet que non noceat foreste mee et quod non sit de foresta mea" (ibid., ii. 83). "Silvas de Bacchleia et Cumenora iste abbas Faritius a regis forestariorum causationibus funditus quietas et in eis capreorum venationem, regio obtinuit decreto" (ibid., ii. 113).

4. See also the passage from the Chronicon abbatiæ Ramesiensis, quoted below, p. 176, n. 4.

Finally the still extant pipe roll of the thirty-first year of Henry I's reign, claims particular attention.¹

This valuable document makes occasional mention of fines inflicted at the pleas of the Forest,² and for the counties of Essex and Hertford these form the matter of a special chapter entitled De placitis foreste.³ The grounds for the sentence having no interest for the Exchequer, the accounts very seldom offer any valuable details. We find, however, evidence of collective fines paid by townships at the pleas of the Forest.⁴ If these are compared with similar fines paid in the thirteenth century, they prove beyond question that, as early as the time of Henry I, when a beast of the Forest was found dead, the nearest township must discover the offender or else pay a fine. Such was evidently the content of the instructions concerning discoveries of the remains of game—under the heading: "De corio vel carne inventa"—in chapter xvii of the Leges Henrici primi.⁵

Finally these accounts prove beyond dispute that, under Henry I and perhaps before him, the justices of the Forest administered a written law, a forest assize, which contained a special prohibition against keeping greyhounds in the royal Forest.⁶

1. Magnum rotulum Scaccarii vel magnum rotulum Pipae de anno 31^o Henrici primi, ed. Hunter, 1833.

2. For example, p. 49, under Surrey: "Albericus clericus compotum de xxxvis. viiid. de placitis Rad. Bass. de foresta."

3. Pp. 157-159. The counties of Essex and Hertford had a single sheriff. It is doubtful, as was said above, whether Hertfordshire contained any forest.

4. "Et de xxs de villata de Benflet . . . Et de dimidia marca de villata de Dunton. Et de dimidia marca de villata de Mucking. Et de xxs de villata de Newport," etc. (ibid., p. 158).

5. See above, p. 173, n. 1.

6. "Gilbertus de Mustiers reddidit compotum de viii li. xld. pro leporariis habitis contra assisam" (p. 158). On the meaning of the word "Assize," see Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. 614 and note. We do not think that this word can simply mean "custom."

It would not, we think, be impossible to reconstruct this assize with some approach to accuracy. We can form no theory as to its date, and there are no grounds for ascribing it to Henry I rather than to William the Conqueror. But some notion of its contents may be gained by a study of the so-called Assize of Woodstock, which certainly does not belong entirely to the reign of Henry II.

The Assize of Woodstock was several times edited by Stubbs. It is to be found in the Gesta Henrici Secundi

The Assize of Woodstock contains material of earlier date ascribed to Benedict of Peterborough, and in the chronicle of Roger of Hoveden, while there are also separate copies of it.¹ Stubbs asserts that he failed to find a single satisfactory text, and indeed the wording of it is obscure, badly arranged, and sometimes inconsistent. It looks as if the text had never been officially fixed, and as if different copyists had strung together articles of various periods. The author of the Gesta Henrici Secundi gives only the earlier articles (1, 2, 3, 5 and 6). Roger of Hoveden does not quote the four last (13, 14, 15 and 16). In the first article the king announces his resolve to subject poachers to the cruel penalties of mutilation which had been inflicted in the time of his grandfather Henry I, whereas in the last he threatens them with imprisonment and fine only.

The twelfth article moreover begins with the words : Apud Wodestoke rex precepit . . . as if the preceding sections belonged to a period before the assembly at Woodstock. Stubbs believed that the version which appears in the Gesta Henrici Secundi was an ancient assize : additions would afterwards be made to it, and article 12 would be inserted last, at the time of the council at Henry's hunting-lodge of Woodstock. This view appears to me unconvincing. In my opinion, it would be more plausible to regard as ancient clauses, dating at least from the days of Henry I, those to which parallels can be found in the sources referred to above—charters and accounts, survivals of Henry I's legislation, and chronicles of the first Norman reigns. On this hypothesis, the assize mentioned in the pipe roll of Henry I will have contained the prohibition to carry arms and to keep greyhounds in the Forest,¹ the order to mutilate the paws of dogs in all places where the peace of the king's beasts was established,² the prohibition against destroying the woods in the Forest,³ the order for the triennial inspection of assarts, purprestures, and waste,⁴ and the command that all the inhabitants of the district shall attend the pleas of the Forest.⁵ These early rules are preserved, we think, in articles 2, 14, 3, 5, 10 and 11, of the Assize of Woodstock. Finally article 1 of that assize evidently alludes to the fact that under Henry I poachers were punished by blinding and castration,⁶ and the old assize

1. See the texts edited by Stubbs in Gesta regis Henrici Secundi Benedicti abbatis (R. S.), i. 323 ; ibid., ii, Appendix iv, a text collated with two copies of the time of Elizabeth ; Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle (R. S.), ii. 245 sqq. ; Sel. Charters, pp. 186 sqq.

1. Assize of Woodstock, § 2; cf. the passages from the Leges Hen. primi cited above, p. 173, n. 1 (de gestacione arcus et iaculorum in foresta . . . de obviacione alicuius in foresta cum canibus), and the passage from the Pipe Roll, supra, p. 174, n. 6.

2. Assize of Woodstock, § 14; cf. Leges Hen. primi (de misera canum expeditacione) and Ordericus Vitalis, ed. cit., iv. 238, (in reference to Henry I): "Pedes etiam canum, qui in vicino silvarum morabantur, ex parte precidi fecit." See also art. 6 of the Charter of the Forest of 1217, which mentions the practice as established at the accession of Henry II.

3. Assize of Woodstock, §§ 3 and 5; cf. Leges Hen. primi (de cessione, de combustione), and Henry I's writ to the huntsman Croc, supra, p. 173, n. 3.

4. Assize of Woodstock, § 10; cf. Leges Hen. primi (de essartis; . . . de edificiis in foresta), and art. 5 of the Charter of the Forest of 1217, which takes us back to the accession of Henry II. William Rufus asserted his right to have the forests of the abbeys inspected by his foresters "de bestiis et de essartis" (Chron. abbatiae Ramesiensis, ed. Macray, p. 210). Henry I exempted an estate of the abbey of Ramsey, "de visionibus forestarum et essartis" (ibid., p. 214).

5. Assize of Woodstock, § 11; cf. Leges Hen. primi . . . "de summonicionibus supersessis."

6. The text of the Assize of Woodstock in the Gesta Henrici Secundi (i. 323) is the only one which specifies "ut amittat oculos et testiculos." In his Select Charters, Stubbs gives the milder version of other copyists.

perhaps enjoined this penalty. In any case it must have resembled the assizes of Henry II and Richard I in entirely forbidding any interference with the king's beasts.¹

It is clear that Henry I was faithful to the declaration of his coronation Charter : he "retained the Forest in his hand." He moreover enlarged it and probably increased rather than lightened the severity of the forest law.

The exercise of the right of the chase, at the time when Henry I ruled in England and Louis VI was king of France, may be cited as a typical example

Comparison with France

of the power of the Norman kings and the weakness of the Capetians. In France the right belonged in theory to all the hauts justiciers and to those on whom they had conferred it ; but in practice it had often been acquired by force and in that case had no other foundation than immemorial possession, or "seisin." It was distributed in an extremely complicated and perplexing way, and was the object of numerous claims and negotiations. The king had forests and warrens, with an administrative system and foresters ; but with respect to the chase, his prerogative cannot be clearly differentiated from the rights of particular nobles, bishops, or even, in some cases, urban or rural communities. He might possess hunting rights on land outside his demesne, but within the demesne there were chases which did not belong to him. He had the privilege of hunting in many forests which belonged to the Church, but there were others of these where the hunting was in the hands of a lay lord. It was only after the beginning of the reign of St. Louis that the king claimed superior rights in respect of warren.¹

1. I do not venture to suggest a date for the remarkable thirteenth article, which lays down that every man dwelling "infra pacem venationis" shall at the age of twelve swear to the peace of the venison. The end of the clause (et clerici laicum feodum tenentes) is apparently a later addition, which may be attributed to Henry II. There is here an evident echo of Anglo-Saxon custom : according to the laws of Cnut, every man of the age of twelve must swear not to be a thief (Liebermann, Gesetze, I. 324-5).

With the death of Henry I and the accession of Stephen, a chapter in the history of the Forest comes to an end. Up to this time, its bounds were continually advancing, and its law was becoming, as it seems, more and more oppressive. From now to the end of the Middle Ages, periods of decline and progress succeed one another, according as the power of the crown wanes or waxes. The "disafforestments" soon begin, interrupted by new afforestations. The forest law, systematised by the lawyers, but feebly defended by them—doubtless because it was scarcely defensible—soon undergoes violent attacks at the hands of the nobles, and from the reign of John gradually decays. Its history is now bound up with the history of the Constitution, until, having become harmless, it ceases to be the theme of complaints and falls into obscurity.

1. It is impossible to cite here the very numerous documents on which the last paragraph is based. They are drawn from royal records and those of the Parlement of Paris, from the Enquêtes of St. Louis, from Cartularies, and so forth. They will be cited in an essay on The Forest and the Right of the Chase in France, which we hope to publish in 1915.

THE FOREST UNDER THE ANGEVINS.

In the charter which he granted in March or April 1136, Stephen pledged himself to restore "to the churches and to the realm" the forests which Henry Disafforestation under Stephen I had added to those of William I and William II.¹ It has been proved that he partially redeemed his promise, though he exacted payment for the disafforestments.² Soon, however, there was no need to buy his consent: the civil war reduced him to impotence; and everyone was free to chase the king's deer and make encroachments on his Forest.³

After these years of anarchy came a reign marked by the increase of royal power and the making of new laws. Henry II restores the forest jurisdiction A great hunter, Henry II was at the same time an administrator, a jurist, and a vigorous and strong-willed ruler. In the charter which he issued after his coronation, he confirmed the liberties and grants bestowed by his grandfather, Henry I, but said nothing about those conceded by Stephen. His silence has been explained on the ground that he regarded as excessive the advantages conferred on the Church.⁴ But without doubt he had equally strong objections to the disafforestments promised in Stephen's charter. Indeed he resumed the lands which, whether by virtue of the charter of 1136 or in the confusion of the civil war, had been disafforested in the reign of his feeble

1. Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. 348; [Sel. Charters, pp. 143 sqq.]

2. Round, Forest of Essex, pp. 37-8. Stubbs' statement (Const. Hist., i. 348) that Stephen "kept none of these promises," is therefore too strong. See also op. cit., p. 349.

3. See the instances mentioned by Round, Geoffrey de Mandeville, p. 376, Forest of Essex, p. 39.

4. Bémont, Chartes des libertés anglaises, Introd. xv. n. 1.

predecessor; and he also made some entirely new additions to the Forest, which under his rule became larger than ever.¹ The pipe rolls prove that he derived large sums from it through judicial fines and rents exacted as compensation for encroachments.²

The royal officials set themselves to formulate a legal theory of the Forest. In the Dialogus de Scaccario, as we have seen, Richard Fitz-Neal, the treasurer, examined the forest organisation, though without trying to justify it on other grounds than the good pleasure of the king. The Constitutiones de Foresta attributed to Cnut are an apocryphal work of slightly different tendency, written probably at the end of Henry II's reign by one of his foresters.³ The Forest, it seems, roused interest enough in the jurists for one of them to devote himself to forging a document in its honour.

In these conditions it was natural that a law-giving king should publish an Assize of the Forest. This he did at Woodstock in the latter part of his reign. In a sixteenth-century copy the document is entitled: "Assize of the lord King Henry touching his Forest and his venison, by the counsel and consent of the archbishops, bishops and barons, earls, and nobles, at Woodstock."⁴ We have

1. Charter of the Forest of 1217, § 1: "Omnes foreste quas Henricus rex avus noster afforestavit." See below (p. 215, n. 4) the passage from the royal letters of 1227: "... tam bosci quos ipse ad forestam revocavit quam illi quos de novo afforestavit." It is scarcely necessary to say that in the reign of Henry II, as evidently at other times, the foresters played a great part in determining the territorial extent of the Forest, and that its continued growth was due in great measure to their initiative. Cf. the letters of Henry III published by Turner, p. xcvi: "... et que foreste afforestate fuerunt per Henricum regem avum nostrum tempore Alani de Neville vel tempore aliorum forestariorum suorum, de voluntate ipsius regis vel de voluntate aliorum forestariorum suorum."

2. Under the head of assarts, Essex in one year brought in 215 l. 18 s. (Round, Forest of Essex, p. 39).

3. Liebermann, Pseudo-Cnut, pp. 32, 35, 37.

4. The title is given (of course in Latin) in MS. Cotton Vespasian, F. iv (Roger of Hoveden, ed. Stubbs, ii. 245, n. 2).

tried to prove that part of this assize must have been derived from a more ancient assize mentioned in the pipe roll of the thirty-first year of Henry I. But most of the articles certainly bear the mark of the administration of Henry II. Such are articles 4, 6, 7, 8, on the oversight of the Forests and the pledges demanded from the foresters, those included who were appointed by individuals to guard private woods within the forest boundaries. Henry II's foresters were zealous and greatly feared. Even villeins were at times appointed to the position.¹

Henry took care to protect his forest officials, and in 1175 four knights were hanged for killing one of them.² At the same time he would tolerate no corrupt dealings, as is shown by the famous instructions which have been published under the title of the Inquest of Sheriffs.³ The first and the last articles of the Assize of Woodstock probably belong also to the reign of Henry II, despite the fact that they contradict each other as to the punishment to be inflicted on poachers—a point to which we shall return later. Article 12, which inflicts imprisonment on a delinquent after his third offence, begins with words—"at Woodstock the king ordained"—which leave no doubt as to its origin. Finally, it was certainly Henry II who drew up article 9, one of the most characteristic and important of the assize—the article concerning clerical offenders.

1. "Ex servis forestarios super provincias constituit" (Ralph Niger, quoted by Liebermann, Pseudo-Cnut, p. 28).

2. Gesta Henrici II, i. 93-4.

3. Inquest of Sheriffs, art. 8, in Sel. Charters, p. 177: "Et inquiratur quid vel quantum acceperint forestarii vel baillivi vel ministri eorum, post terminum praedictum, in baillivis suis, quocunque modo illud ceperint vel quacunque occasione; et si quid perdonaverint de rectis regis pro praemio vel promissione vel pro amicitia aliqua . . . et si forestarii vel baillivi eorum aliquem ceperint vel attachiaverint per vadium et plegium, vel retaverint, et postea sine iudicio per se relaxaverint . . ." On this Inquest, ordered by Henry II in 1170, after an absence of four years from England, see Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. 510 sqq., and Sel. Charters, pp. 174 sqq.

The king, this article states, "forbids any clerk to trespass against his venison or his forests; he has strictly ordered his foresters, if they find clerks trespassing, to seize them without hesitation, keep them in custody and attach them; and he himself will be their warranty." Thus the clergy, though withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the common law, came under that of the Forest. Some years before, in 1175, Henry II had commanded that all persons should be sought out who, taking advantage of the rising of his sons, had chased the king's venison. Many clerks were accused and brought before the temporal courts; the papal legate, Hugo Pierleoni, raised no protest: it was understood between him and the king that the clergy, though in general exempt from secular justice, should lose their privilege in the case of forest offences.¹ Such was the origin of the ninth article of the Assize of Woodstock. From the point of view of Henry's interests, this clause was certainly unwise. The Church was the mistress of public opinion, and it was a mistake to arouse her enmity. The clergy never forgave the legate for his compliance,² and the forest system became a theme for clerical invective. So at least we may infer from a story told by Walter Map, one of Henry's itinerant justices. The bishop of Lincoln, St. Hugh, who had so great a moral influence at this time, said one day to Henry II that poor men oppressed by the foresters would enter paradise, but that the king and the

Clerical offenders

Hostility of the Church towards the foresters

1. Ralph de Diceto, Ymagines historiarum, ed. Stubbs (R. S.), i. 402-3. See the passage from Henry II's letter to the pope quoted in Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. 436, n. 4. On the severity with which the offences of 1175 were punished, cf. ibid., p. 521.

2. Gesta Hen. II, i. 105: "Praedictus cardinalis, qui in Angliam per mandatum regis venerat, concessit et dedit domino regi licentiam implacitandi clericos regni sui de forestis suis et de captione venationum. Ecce membrum Sathane! Ecce ipsius Sathanae conductus satelles! qui tam subito factus de pastore raptor, videns lupum venientem, fugit et dimisit oves sibi a summo pontifice commissas."

forestarii would remain foris, outside.¹ No doubt the pun had a great vogue, and reappeared in many sermons where the foresters were abused. The author of the Magna vita sancti Hugonis declares that in his zeal against the foresters, enemies of the liberties of the Church, St. Hugh went so far as to excommunicate Geoffrey, the summus forestarius.² If Henry II had winked at some of the deer-stealing and encroachments of the monks, he would perhaps have secured a little more peace for his successors.³

Richard I—or rather those who governed England for

1. "[The beginning is wanting] . . . verumtamen venatores hominum, quibus iudicium est datum de vita vel de morte ferarum, mortiferi, comparatione quorum Minos est misericors, Rhadamanthus rationem amans, Aeneas aequanimis, nihil in his laetum nec letiferum. Hos Hugo, prior Selewude, iam electus Lincolniae, reperit repulsos ab ostio thalami regis quos ut obiurgare vidit insolenter et indigne ferre, miratus ait: 'Qui vos?' Responderunt: 'Forestarii sumus.' Ait illis 'Forestarii foris stent.' Quod rex interius audiens risit, et exivit obviam ei. Cui prior: 'Vos tangit haec parabola, quia, pauperibus quos hii torquent paradisum ingressis, cum forestariis foris stabitis.' Rex autem hoc verbum serium habuit pro ridiculo, et ut Salomon excelsa non abstulit, forestarios non delevit, sed adhuc nunc post mortem suam sitant coram leviathan carnes hominum et sanguinem bibunt; excelsa struunt, quae nisi Dominus in manu forti non destruxerit, non auferuntur hii. Dominum sibi praesentem timent et placant, dominum quem non vident offendere non metuentes. Non dico quin multi viri timorati, boni et iusti, nobiscum involvantur in curia, nec quia aliqui sint in hac valle miseriae iudices misericordiae, sed secundum maiorem et insaniorem loquor aciem." (Map, De nugis curialium, ed. Wright, pp. 7-8.) The author of the Magna Vita Sancti Hugonis reports the saint's pun, but without mentioning the king: "Recte homines isti et satis proprie nuncupantur forestarii, foris namque stabunt a regno Dei" (ed. Dimock, p. 176).

2. "Est . . . inter alias abusioinum pestes, prima in regno Anglorum tyrannidis forestariorum pestis videlicet provinciales depopulans. Huic violentia pro lege est, rapina in laude, aequitas execrabilis, innocentia reatus. Huius immanitatem mali nulla conditio, gradus nullus, nec quisquam, ut totum breviter exprimamus, rege inferior, evasit indemnis, quem illius iniuriosa iurisdictio non saepe tentasset elidere. Hac cum pernicie primus Hugoni congressus fuit . . . Cum enim, more solito, ut in caeteros, ita et in suos homines, contra ecclesiae suae libertatem, forestarii debacchari coepissent, eo usque res tandem processit, ut summum regis forestarium, nomine Galfridum, excommunicationis vinculo innodaret. Quo rex comperto vehementem exarsit in iram" (Magna vita S. Hugonis, ed. cit., pp. 125-6).

3. On the procedure followed in the case of clerical offenders during the thirteenth century, and the complaints put forward by the clergy in 1257, see Turner, pp. lxxxvii sqq.

him during his long absences¹—and his successor John maintained the severities of the forest law, and by extending the bounds of the forests made it yet more burdensome.² When the barons rose against John and had him at their mercy, they contemplated demanding the immediate reform of the Forest. We have already reprinted and discussed certain notes of an agent of Philip

The Forest
under Richard I and John

Original demands of the barons

Augustus, which, under the title of "concessions of King John," throw much light on the negotiations between the king and the barons, and on the first demands presented by the latter. Out of a dozen articles, three are concerned with the Forest: and the impression of Philip's agent was that the barons demanded the surrender of all the forests created by John, Richard I, and Henry II; liberty for individuals to take wood for their own use in the parts of the Forest which they held; a rule as to the powers of the foresters in these same private woods; and the abolition of punishment by death or mutilation for trespasses to the venison.³ The barons, however, let slip this opportunity of ending the tyranny of the forest system.

As a matter of fact, they inserted in their petition and in the Great Charter only two clauses specifically affect-

1. On the Forest under Richard I, see Hoveden, iv. 63. At the pleas of the Forest in 1198, the justices read certain "praecepta regis" which repeated (see the text in Hoveden, pp. 63 sqq.) Henry II's Assize, and added several articles to it (arts. xiii, xiv, xvi). Trespasses to the venison, according to the Assize of 1198, were punished by blinding and castration (art. xiv.) A charter of Richard in favour of Ramsey abbey (Cartularium monasterii de Rameseia, ii. 296, no. 422) shows that the Church obtained some relaxation of the forest law only as an exceptional privilege.

2. The Great Charter alludes to afforestations made by John and Richard (arts. 47 and 53). In the "perambulationes" published by Mr. Turner (pp. 116 sqq.) and by Mr. Greswell (Forests of Somerset, pp. 272 sqq.) there are instances of afforestations made by John. On the other hand, as we shall see later (pp. 212 sqq.), there were disafforestments carried out by Richard and John, or at least promised by them, in return for money.

3. See above, pp. 124 sqq.

Clauses in the Great Charter

ing the Forest: the king promised to abandon the forests made by himself,¹ without formally pledging himself to abandon those made by Richard and Henry II;² and, secondly, the arbitrary summons to the pleas of the Forest of those who dwelt outside its limits, was to be forbidden.³ In addition the barons adopted a plan which threatened the whole system. They wanted to do away with the abuses which made the Forest intolerable, and which varied to a small extent in different parts; and fearing lest some might be overlooked and spared, they demanded the appointment of elected juries to hold inquisitions in every county regarding "all the evil customs touching forests, warrens, foresters, and warreners";⁴ the twelve sworn knights were even charged

Enquiry into the forests and warrens

sion of these evil customs within the fifteen days following the inquisition. The king had to accept this Draconian clause, and only obtained, at the last moment, the concession that he should receive notice before the abolition of any evil custom was announced.⁵ As early as 19 June, the real date of the conclusion of peace between John and the barons,⁶ he called upon the sheriffs to cause these juries to be elected in every county;⁷ and another writ of 27 June shows that the knights were at once chosen, and that they were considered as local representatives of the committee of twenty-five barons.⁸

1. Articles of the Barons, § 47; Magna Carta, § 47: "Omnes foreste que afforestate sunt tempore nostro statim deafforestentur."

2. He promised that complaints on this point should be impartially considered after his return from crusade (Magna Carta, § 53).

3. Articles of the Barons, § 39; Magna Carta, § 44.

4. They added "and rivers." See also § 47 of the Articles and of Magna Carta as to the disafforestation of rivers preserved by John. But the question of fishing played only a minor part, and was put on one side in the Charter of the Forest.

5. Articles of the Barons, § 39; Magna Carta, § 48.

6. MacKechnie, Magna Carta, p. 47.

7. Sel. Charters, p. 303; MacKechnie, op. cit., pp. 576-7.

8. MacKechnie, p. 577; the French text is in Bémont, Chartes, p. xxiv n.

There can be no doubt that the barons were aiming at little or nothing less than the suppression of the Forest jurisdiction. The king and his advisers were themselves so sure of it that they asked the clergy to step in to give article 48 the interpretation least injurious to the crown.

Attempted abolition of the Forest

Though assuredly the defence of the forest law was little to their interest, eight bishops agreed to sign a declaration which is preserved in the close rolls: they testify that this article was understood by the two parties in such a sense that all customs essential to the existence of the Forest ought to be maintained.¹

This conciliatory interpretation would certainly not have convinced the barons and the knights on the juries.

It was the civil war and John's death that saved the Forest. In the confirmation of the Great Charter issued after the accession of Henry III (on 12 Nov. 1216), the immediate disafforestation of the forests made by John was promised: but the articles of Magna Carta concerning "forests and foresters, warrens and warreners" were placed among the "difficult and doubtful" clauses which demanded consideration.² Nothing more was heard of committing the reform of abuses to those who suffered from them and who would doubtless have left in existence next to nothing of an institution they detested.

The Forest
saved by the civil war

1. ". . . Articulus iste ita intellectus fuit ex utraque parte, quum de eo tractabitur, et expressus, quod omnes consuetudines ille remanere debent, sine quibus foreste servari non possint: et hoc presentibus litteris protestamur." The signatures include the names of the bishops of Winchester, Worcester, and Bath, who to the end remained faithful to John, and of the archbishops of Canterbury and Dublin, and the bishops of London, Lincoln, and Coventry. (Rymer, ed. 1816, vol. i, pt. i, 134).

2. Charter of 1216, § 42, in Sel. Charters, p. 339.

THE CHARTER OF THE FOREST OF 1217.

The wise men who governed in behalf of the infant Henry III made what concessions were inevitable, and as early as 6 November, 1217, published the Charter of the Forest.¹ An examination of this document is particularly instructive.

The Charter
of the Forest :
6 Nov., 1217

Royal rights curtailed.
i. Licence to hunt in the Forest

The personal privileges of the king were curtailed by articles 11 and 13. In the twelfth century, hunting was a pleasure which certain kings were loth to allow their barons to enjoy. Henry I was accused of wishing to restrict it almost entirely to himself. On the other hand, John, notwithstanding certain vagaries² which can be sufficiently explained by his capricious and despotic character, made considerable use of the Forest to reward services or gain partisans.³ He went so far as to permit his barons to hunt in the forest country administered by Brian de l'Isle, when they were passing through it, adding : " We possess our forests and our venison not for ourself only, but also for our subjects." He merely ordered Brian de l'Isle to ascertain who made use of the privilege and what was taken.⁴ It may be said that

1. Bémont, Chartes, pp. 64 sqq. ; Stubbs, Sel. Charters, pp. 344 sqq. For a refutation of Roger of Wendover's statement that the first Charter of the Forest was published by John, see Richard Thomson's Historical Essay on the Magna Charta (1829), pp. 237-8.

2. As when in 1209, for example, he forbade " the taking of birds throughout all England." Cf. on this passage from Roger of Wendover, Turner, p. ciii, and Greswell, p. 70.

3. For examples of these grants to individuals, see Fisher, Forest of Essex, pp. 199 sqq.

4. Rotuli Lit. Claus. (ed. Hardy), i. 85.

the principle laid down in this letter was confirmed in the eleventh article of the Charter of the Forest: every archbishop, bishop, earl, or baron passing through the Forest, might take one or two head of venison under the oversight of the forester.

Another privilege of the king was that of reserving for himself, throughout the realm, the eyries of the fowl of the Forest—hawks, falcons, eagles, and herons—and the wild honey found in the woods. The Norman kings had in this case apparently brought over and converted into a royal prerogative a right which in France every lord seems to have enjoyed on his estates.¹ By article 13 of the Charter of the Forest, Henry III renounced these claims: every free man might have the eyries and the honey found in his woods. The high prices which were paid for the birds used in hawking, and the extensive use made of honey and wax, gave much importance to this concession.

In the letter to Brian de l'Isle, mentioned above, John stated that the beasts of the Forest had more to fear from thieves than from the barons. All manner of precautions were taken against poaching by the inhabitants of the Forest or by dogs. In the pleas of 1209 which have been printed by Mr. Turner, we read of poachers chased by the foresters, of inhabitants of the Forest prosecuted for possessing arms without permission or for having eaten of the venison, and also of dogs which have been caught hunting on their own account and which are to be produced before the justices.² As on the continent, the

Measures against poachers
maintained

1. Capitul. de Villis, § 36 (Boretius, i. 86); Summa de legibus Normanniae (13th century) in J. Tardif, Coutumiers de Normandie, ii. 12 sqq.; and an ordinance of Charles VI: "... Retinemus nobis . . . omnes nidos avium nobilium" (Ordonnances, viii. 162). If a swarm of bees was found, it became the property of the lord who had the exercise of haut justice (see De Maulde, Condition Forestière de l'Orléanais, p. 227; also a document of 1259 in Layettes du Trésor des Chartes, iii. no. 4474).

2. Turner, pp. 2 sqq.

forest law compelled the inhabitants of the Forest to mutilate the fore-paws of their dogs.¹ The foresters profited by this rule to levy arbitrary fines, and would confiscate a peasant's ox if his dog could still trot, however haltingly. In the Charter of the Forest, the only alleviation granted was that the "lawing" of dogs should be confined to the districts where it was customary at the accession of Henry II; that it should be performed according to a fixed rule, and inspected by a jury at the time of the regards; and finally that no more than a three-shilling fine should be imposed on offenders. The law against carrying or possessing weapons remained in force for the inhabitants of the Forest.

Regulation of the lawing of dogs

Change in the law on purpresture

Amnesty for trespassers
to the vert

Mention has been made of the annoyances inflicted on the pretext of protecting the trees and pastures. Articles 9 and 12 of the Charter, which were certainly regarded as among the most valuable, restored to dwellers in the Forest some of the rights of which they had been deprived. They might make mills, fish-ponds, pools, marl-pits, or ditches, clear their lands outside the covert (art. 12), and use at pleasure their own woods for feeding pigs (art. 9). Finally they were relieved of their annual payments to the Treasury for such purprestures, wastes, or assarts as had been made from the accession of Henry II to the second year of Henry III. But the law against touching the trees

1. On the "expeditatio canum," see Fisher, Forest of Essex, pp. 226 sqq. Du Cange, s.v. expeditare, cites only English authorities for this practice. But the custom of mutilating dogs, or at all events of hobbling them, on land preserved for hunting, was known on the continent. Cf. a charter of Aymeri, vicomte de Thouars, of the year 1229: "Canes vero rusticorum manencium infra metas garene nostre, de duabus magistris unciis unius pedis anterioris mutilabuntur" (Cartulaires du Bas-Poitou, published by Marchegay, p. 39). See also the custom of Hesdin in Richebourg, Nouveau Coutumier Général, vol. i, pt. i, 337; Sander Pierron, Hist. de la Forêt de Soigne, p. 253, etc. For Belgium, see on this subject, a work of A. Faider, which, however, is not on the whole to be recommended: Hist. du droit de chasse et de la législation sur la chasse en Belgique, France, Angleterre, Allemagne, Italie, et Hollande, pp. 32, 39, 71, 161.

was maintained, and new offences of waste or assart were to be punished by the usual amercements.¹

There had been bitter complaints of the irregularity, the arbitrariness, and the abuses of forest justice. By article 16, custodians of castles and other local officers, who had their friends and enemies, were forbidden to hold the pleas of the Forest. The pleas of the vert and the venison, enrolled and attested by the seals of the verderers, were to be presented to the capitalis forestarius on eyre, and tried before him alone. The assizes of the twelfth century,² moreover, had insisted on the presence at the forest pleas of all the inhabitants of the county. Although this demand was liable to interpretations which diminished its rigour,³ it clearly gave occasion for the levy of lucrative fines from various defaulters; and this was one of the abuses of which the suppression was demanded by the barons in their petition of 1215. They asked that the summons of the justices should not include inhabitants of the county dwelling outside the Forest, except those who were under accusation or had stood surety for offenders. This thirty-ninth article of the Petition was copied almost word for word in the Charter of the Forest (art. 2). In the same way, the meetings of the swanimote for the regulation of the pasture served as a pretext for fining the absent: but the presence of the

Safeguards against abuses

Attendance at the forest courts

1, "Qui de cetero vastum, purpresturam vel assartum sine licentia nostra in illis fecerint, de vastis et assartis respondeant" (art. 4). The words "de purpresturis" are omitted; but there is no doubt that this is merely due to careless drafting. Article 12 did away in great measure with the crime of purpresture, but it did not authorise the making of new enclosures without permission; in the thirteenth century the justices had the fences of such pulled down and amerced the offender; see the examples in Turner, p. lxxii.

2. Assize of Woodstock, § 11 (Sel. Charters, p. 188). Assize of Richard I, § 12 (Hoveden, iv. 64).

3. This is proved by the following verdict returned in 1209 at the pleas of Rutland and Leicestershire: "Veredictum militum comitatus Rotelandie quod ad summonicionem iusticiariorum de foresta venire debent ad placita foreste omnes de comitatu Leicestrie comuniter qui manent extra forestam ad distanciam duarum leucarum" (Turner, p. 6).

general public was not necessary, and the Charter lays down that they shall not be forced to attend (art. 8).

Among the most famous articles are 10 and 15, dealing with punishments and outlaws: "No one shall henceforth lose life or members for the sake of our venison; but if anyone has been arrested and convicted of the taking of venison, he shall pay a heavy ransom if he has wherewith to redeem himself; and if he has not wherewith to redeem himself, he shall lie in our prison for a year and a day; and if after a year and a day he can find pledges, he shall go out of prison; but if not, he shall abjure the realm of England." "All who have been outlawed for the sake of the Forest only, from the time of king Henry our grandfather to our first coronation, shall come into our peace without hindrance, and shall find safe pledges that they will not henceforth offend against us touching our Forest." In future, then, banishment was the worst that could befall the poacher who had killed the king's deer; and an amnesty threw the realm open to those who had previously been exiled for this offence.

It is possible to determine with more or less exactness the nature of the penalties actually inflicted in the twelfth century, and consequently the value of article 10 of the Charter. As for the barons, they had the privilege, in the twelfth as in the thirteenth century, of being tried only in the king's court: a heavy fine at the king's mercy was their worst possible fate if they hunted his deer.¹ It remains to enquire whether death, mutilation, or banishment awaited offenders who were not barons.

The chroniclers under the first Norman kings accuse William the Conqueror and Henry I of having punished

1. See the case of Robert Corbet in 1209 (Select Pleas, p. 8). See also Gesta Hen. II, i. 94. The author of the Constitutiones Cnuti de foresta states the principle which was applied in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries: "Episcopi, abbates, et barones mei . . . si regales [feras occiderint], restabunt rei regi pro libito suo, sine certa emendatione" (ed. Liebermann, § 26). Cf. Capitul. 802, § 39 (Boretius, i. 98).

Cruel punishments under the Norman kings poachers by mutilation, and William Rufus of having put them to death.¹ Henry II and Richard I assert in their assizes that Henry I punished trespasses to the venison with blinding and castration.² These were the penalties used in the Carolingian Empire to punish crimes against the sovereign,³ and the ferocity of penal law in the Middle Ages compels us to accept the statement of the assizes as most probably true. But on the accession of the Plantagenets, these severities were modified, and the object of the authorities was apparently to extract the largest possible fines from the delinquents. William of Newburgh says in fact that Henry II showed himself less cruel than his ancestors.⁴

Greater leniency under Henry II In the Assize of Woodstock, the king asserts that he has hitherto been content with punishing the guilty through their goods.⁵ It is true that he declares his resolve to apply henceforth the penalties in vogue under Henry I, but this was unquestionably a mere threat, intended to frighten the king's faithful subjects, to whom his officers had publicly to read the assize.⁶ There is in any case a discrepancy between this declaration and articles 12 and 16. Article 12 lays down that for forest offences—

1. See the passages collected by Liebermann, Pseudo-Cnut, pp. 20-1; Freeman, Norman Conquest, iv. 610, v. 124-5.

2. Assize of Woodstock (text in the Gesta Hen. II), § 1; Assize of Richard I, § 1 (Hoveden, iv. 63).

3. Brunner, Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte, ii. 64, 78; cf. art. 10 of the so-called Statutes of William the Conqueror, compiled under Henry I, (Textus Roffensis): "Interdico etiam ne quis occidatur aut suspendatur pro aliqua culpa, sed eruantur oculi et testiculi abscondantur" (Sel. Charters, p. 99). The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, in speaking of the laws of William I for the preservation of game, mentions only blinding (i. 355).

4. "Venationis delicias, aequae ut avus, plus justo diligens, in puniendis tamen positum pro feris legum transgressoribus avo mitior fuit: ille enim . . . homicidarum et fericidarum in publicis animadversionibus nullam vel parvam esse distantiam voluit; hic autem huiusmodi transgressores carcerali custodia sive exilio ad tempus coercuit" (Historia rerum anglicarum, lib. iii. cap. 26, in Howlett, Chronicles of the reigns of Stephen, etc. [R. S.], i. 280).

5. "Propter eorum catalla" (§ 1).

6. On this reading of the assize, see Hoveden, iv. 63.

trespasses to the venison included—sureties shall in the first instance be demanded, and that the delinquent shall not be imprisoned until the third offence. The sixteenth article concerns the crime, always regarded as particularly serious, of poaching by night: “no one shall hunt to take beasts by night, within the Forest or without,¹ in any place which the king’s beasts frequent or where they have their peace, on pain of imprisonment for a year and of making fine at the king’s pleasure.” In the

Richard I’s Assize Assize of Richard I, which was drafted in more precise language, this last clause disappears, and offenders are simply threatened with the loss of eyes and castration.² But it is unlikely that this penalty was often inflicted: Roger of Wendover affirms that Richard I contented himself with the imprisonment or banishment of those who stole his deer.³

The jurists and judges of this period seem on the whole to have been mercifully inclined. To the author of the Constitutiones the death penalty is limited to serfs and inflicted on them only if the beast has been killed.⁴ The pleas of 1209, which are particularly interesting, contain no mention of the penalties of death and mutilation.

Abandonment of corporal penalties in practice On the other hand these records show that people were imprisoned, not only on clear proof of an offence, but on suspicions that were sometimes extremely vague. Now prison discipline was commonly very severe during the Middle Ages.⁵ A cer-

1. We shall try later to explain the words “extra forestam” (pp. 233 sqq.).
2. Assize of 1198, § 14, in Hoveden, iv. 65. Nevertheless, art. 17 of this assize quotes, without revoking it, art. 12 of the Assize of Woodstock: “. . . Idem rex Henricus statuit apud Wudestoke, quod quicunque forisfecerit ei de foresta sua semel de venatione sua, de seipso salvi plegii capiantur,” etc.

3. Wendover, in Matthew Paris (ed. Luard, R. S.), iii. 213.

4. Constitutiones de foresta, ed. Liebermann, arts. 24-5.

5. Particularly in England; cf. Jusserand, English Wayfaring Life in the Middle Ages (trans. by Miss Toulmin Smith), p. 266; Ch. Gross, Coroners’ Rolls (Selden Society), p. xxiv. n. 1.

tain Ralph Red of Siberton, imprisoned for having feasted on a doe, died in his cell. Roger Tocke, his friend, had been put in gaol also, although he was probably innocent: "he lay," we read, "a long time in prison, so that he is nearly dead." Such a prospect frightened the guilty, and numbers fled and were outlawed. One of these was Hugh the Scot: venison was found in his house; he took sanctuary, kept to the church for a month, and escaped in women's clothes; he was pronounced *utlagatus*¹ As early as 1166 the Assize of Clarendon prescribed what measures should be adopted against those accused of forest offences who fled from one county to another.²

Imprisonment therefore awaited both those accused and those merely suspected.³ It awaited also the penniless and friendless who failed to find sureties, and in some cases threatened even those who did. It would be unsound to urge that imprisonment was not, technically, a penalty; for, as we have seen, article 16 of the Assize of Woodstock punished nocturnal poaching with the poena imprisonmentis unius anni.

To sum up, during the reigns of the first three Plantagenets, poachers had to fear sometimes exile, but more often ruinous fines or very severe imprisonment; and the gaol was an object of such horror that often it seemed a greater evil than flight and the wretched lot of an outlaw. On the other hand, forest justice, organised with the main object of making money, was so regulated that it was impossible for the death penalty to be inflicted. This is sufficiently proved by the length of the procedure in capital cases and the long intervals between the eyres

1. Turner, pp. 1—3, 6, 9.

2. Art. 17 (Sel. Charters, p. 172).

3. According to article 12 of the Assize of Woodstock, delinquents could not be imprisoned till their third offence. It is probable that this article fell into disuse as far as trespasses to the venison were concerned. It is significant that it was confirmed by Edward I only so far as it touched trespasses to the vert (Statutes, i. 243).

of the justices. During this period, the execution or mutilation of an offender must have been an exceptional occurrence: these penalties, it is true, are mentioned in the negotiations which preceded the issue of Magna Carta; but neither in the Petition or Articles of the Barons, nor in the Charter itself, was it considered necessary to require their abolition.

It would therefore be a mistake to regard article 10 of the Charter of 1217 as a notable gain for the inhabitants of the Forest. It made very little difference to their actual position, and did nothing more than pronounce the royal blessing, so to speak, on previous practice. The taking of game was punished by a "heavy ransom"; the impecunious, it is true, were no longer liable to a year's imprisonment; but if they failed to find sureties, they were reduced at the end of this time to the miserable necessity of "abjuring the realm."¹ Still, the threats of dreadful punishments disappeared.

In this last respect, English law was henceforward in advance of the customary law of France. Beaumanoir expressly states that those who poach by night in warrens are liable to be hanged,² though he adds that "some people" are not of this opinion. Enguerrand de Coucy having hanged "three young nobles for that they were found in his woods with bows and arrows, [but] without dogs and without other engines whereby they could have taken wild beasts," St. Louis forfeited the wood, which he gave to an abbey, and deprived Enguerrand of "all high justice of woods and fish-ponds, so that he can since that time neither imprison nor put to death for any offence committed there."³ These passages prove that

1. That is, binding themselves by oath to leave England for ever. See A. Réville, L'Abjuration regni, Rev. historique, Sept.-Oct. 1892, pp. 1 sqq. [See also Benham, Red Paper Book of Colchester, p. 33.]

2. Ed. Salmon, i. 474, art. 935. See also the texts of the Customs—for example, the 'Coutumier de Beaumont,' in E. Bonvalot, Le Tiers Etat d'après la Charte de Beaumont, Appendix, p. 10.

3. Guillaume de Saint-Pathus, Vie de Saint-Louis, ed. H. F. Delaborde, p. 136.

the penalty of death for poaching existed in thirteenth-century France, but that jurists did not unanimously countenance it and that the king controlled its application.

In England the consequences of poaching affected not only the poachers but also all their neighbours. In the pleas of 1209 we read of the amercement of numerous townships and tithings after the discovery of a dead beast or its remains : thus one township is amerced for not having " raised the hue and cry on evil-doers to the king " who have killed a hind ; another, because it has not found the offender or because it has gone back on its first evidence.¹ The Charter of the Forest made no change in this very remunerative system of collective responsibility, which must have been most unpopular.

As a rule the exactions of the foresters were for their own personal profit. The Charter of the Forest, therefore, provided safeguards against them. Many foresters made undue demands for sheaves of oats or wheat, for lambs, sucking-pigs, or money, and they also levied " scotale." ² These extortions were forbidden, and it was agreed that the number of the foresters should be limited. The foresters-in-fee had the right of receiving " chiminage " in the woods of the demesne from the sellers of wood and charcoal : but, as they paid a ferm to the king and kept the revenues for themselves, they would extort very heavy sums, and even claim chiminage from poor folks carrying bundles of faggots or charcoal on their backs, demanding it too in woods outside the demesne. These abuses, which brought nothing to the Treasury, were to cease. ³

1. Turner, pp. 1—9.

2. Regarding scotale, see Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. 672 and notes, and below, p. 204.

3. Arts. 7, 14. Article 5 does not specify the abuses committed by the regards. In the pleas of 1209 the references to them are equally obscure (Turner, pp. 6-7).

Frequently also the foresters strove to curtail the customary rights of the people.¹ They received a hint to respect the communia de herbagio et aliis in the demesne woods which were not to be disafforested.² They often prevented the inhabitants of the Forest from throwing open their pastures until the king's woods had been provided with swine :³ henceforward every free man might "agist" his own woods at his pleasure, drive his pigs to pasture across the royal demesne, and receive the pannage due to him.⁴

These guarantees against the abuse of power by royal officials must have been warmly welcomed. The foresters were renowned for brutality, insolence, and greed. Those whom they had maltreated sometimes took a cruel revenge.⁵ But a mere legal enactment was not enough to reform them, and they long remained deservedly unpopular.

The corruption and excessive zeal of the foresters were not peculiar to England. But what, in England, rendered intolerable these and all other abuses of the forest system, constituting them a national grievance against the king, was the fact that the Forest, though royal property and not divided among a number of magnates, was nevertheless larger in England than anywhere else, and that the kings kept on increasing it by arbitrary acts of afforestation. The question of disafforestation consequently seemed of the

1. On the somewhat obscure question of customary rights in the Forest, see Fisher, Forest of Essex, ch. v and vi. [Cf. Miss Bazeley, op. cit. p. 269.]

2. Art. 1.

3. This may at least be inferred from art. 7 of the Assize of Woodstock (Sel. Charters, p. 187).

4. Art. 9.

5. The author of the Magna Vita S. Hugonis (p. 178) tells how, at the end of the preceding century, a forester was killed by men whom he had treated with extraordinary insolence. His body was cut into pieces which were carried to three different places. The huntsmen had the same evil reputation; they were, says John of Salisbury, coarse, drunken, and licentious (Policraticus, lib. i. cap. iv, cited by Fisher, Forest of Essex, p. 199).

greatest importance, and took the foremost place in the Charter of 1217. It was the subject of the first and third articles. Nothing is said there about the forests made by the Norman kings; and in these therefore the forest law continued to be enforced. But the forests created by Henry II were to be viewed by "good and loyal men," and all the woods which he had afforested outside the royal demesne to the damage of their owners, were to be disafforested.¹ There was, moreover, to be an immediate disafforestation of all woods outside the demesne which had been made forest by Richard or John.² In granting these articles Henry's advisers were making a very great concession, which the barons had not explicitly demanded in 1215.

Such was the Charter of the Forest. It granted only part of the benefits hoped for in 1215. The extraordinary jurisdiction of the Forest remained. The inhabitants were still oppressed by hateful burdens, subject to irksome restrictions, and liable to heavy collective fines. But a good number of the evil customs from which they suffered, and from which the Great Charter of 1215 had vaguely promised to free them, were now suppressed by law, and, above all, some of them might confidently look forward to the disafforestation of their land and a return to normal conditions. Henceforth the English could appeal to a legal document. The rule of unmitigated despotism had ended, and the decline of the Forest was beginning.

Significance of the Charter

1. Art. 1.

2. Art. 3. Cf. above, p. 184. It will be seen that the interpretation of these articles might have been a matter of difficulty. Why select for disafforestation the woods which Henry II had afforested "ad dampnum illius cuius boscus fuerit"? How was this limitation to be understood? Moreover, was it possible to disafforest "statim," without inquisition, the woods afforested by Richard and John? In practice it appears that no difficulties were raised, and all the disafforestments were preceded by inquisitions. On this point see in particular the document published by Turner, p. xcvi. "Statim deafforestentur" was an injunction that could not be carried out, and no attempt was made to enforce it.

(5)

THE FOREST IN THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY.

The Select Pleas published by Mr. Turner prove that, notwithstanding the maintenance of the forest organisation and the rights which they had refused to surrender, the thirteenth-century kings, Henry III and Edward I, had great difficulty in keeping a hold on their hunting preserves and the revenues which they drew from the Forest.

Difficulty of defending the Forest

The Forest was a source of many temptations both to those who lived there and to those who were appointed to guard it. It is instructive to note the "chapters" of the great inquisition held in the royal forests in 1244-5 by Robert Passelewe.¹ The commissioners were to investigate the injuries done to the king by the inhabitants of the Forest, who had enlarged their fields at the expense of the vert, put up buildings, made parks and warrens, sold wood and charcoal, pastured cattle and horses, and all without any legal authorisation.² According to Matthew Paris, Robert Passelewe punished these offences severely, and despoiled of their goods, drove from their houses, imprisoned, banished, or reduced to beggary, a large number of people, both clergy and laymen, nobles and commons.³

i. Encroachments by the inhabitants

1. In regard to Passelewe, see Fisher, op. cit., pp. 107-8.

2. Inquisitiones de forisfactis diversis super foresta domini regis, published in the Additamenta to the Chronicle of M. Paris (vi, 94 sqq.). On the frequency of trespasses to the vert in the 13th century, see Fisher, Forest of Essex, pp. 235-6.

3. M. Paris, iv, 400, 426-7. The pipe rolls of 29 Henry III preserve the financial results of this inquisition, and the pleas of 1255 furnish an example of a house built "to the damage of the Forest" in Huntingdonshire, which Passelewe ordered to be pulled down (Turner, p. 18).

Robert Passelewe had also to deal with corrupt foresters. Most of the instructions which he was to follow concern abuses committed by the
 ii. Dishonest foresters foresters, and especially the consent which they had given, freely or otherwise, gratia vel lucro, to the illegalities of the inhabitants. They were also suspected of selling wood and hay, of wresting justice to their own profit, and of leasing forest land without authority.¹

All these "chapters" of the inquisition were drawn up by men who understood their business. We know, moreover, of the malpractices laid in 1269 to the charge of Peter de Neville, warden of the forest in Rutland. According to the indictment brought against him by the verderers, the regarkers, and twelve knights and loyal men, he had in thirteen years appropriated seven thousand trees, either for his personal use, or to sell them, give them to his friends, or make charcoal from them, and he had embezzled numerous fines and dues which ought to have gone to the Treasury, not to mention acts of extortion and violence against the inhabitants.² The pleas of the Forest likewise contain cases of subordinate foresters who allowed themselves to be bribed by offenders, or took the king's trees and game for their own benefit.³

Poaching was prevalent everywhere. Among those accused are to be found not only professionals, consueti malefactores de venacione domini regis,⁴
 iii. Poaching but also university students,⁵ a schoolmaster and his assistant,⁶ numerous clerks and chaplains,⁷ bailiffs and foresters both royal and private,⁸ members

1. Inquisitiones, cap. 3, 6 sqq.

2. Turner, p. 44.

3. Ibid., pp. 20-1, 24.

4. Ibid., p. 43.

5. Ibid., pp. 129 sqq.

6. Ibid., p. 21.

7. Ibid., 21, 33, 38, 79, 88, 94, 103, 112, etc. Clerical offenders were in the thirteenth century claimed by the spiritual courts, but they paid the king a composition fixed by the justices of the Forest (Turner, pp. lxxxvii sqq.).

8. Ibid., pp. 20, 36, 39, 110.

of the king's household,¹ and lastly very great lords like earl Ferrers² and the earl of Gloucester.³ There were bands of poachers, up to a dozen strong,⁴ hunting on foot or on horseback,⁵ with dogs and weapons of all kinds. They cared nothing for the gamekeepers, shot at them, tied them to trees, and sometimes killed them ;⁶ and to such lengths did they go that to repress their increasing boldness, the Parliament of 1293 decreed that no proceedings should be taken against foresters, parkers, and warreners if they killed poachers who would not suffer themselves to be arrested.⁷ It was the more difficult to catch the poacher that he had accomplices everywhere. He was popular : his exploits were sung in ballads, and he was represented as a redresser of wrongs, a friend of the king and the people. Robin Hood was the model hero. He was an outlaw, he lived on the venison of the Forest and on the superfluities of the rich : but he was courteous ; he was religious, devoted to Our Lady ; and he loved the king more than anyone in the world.⁸ In the Tale of Gamelyn, the king gives a good reception to Gamelyn, a brigand who sits in judgment on judges and has them hanged, and appoints him "chef justice of al his fre forest."⁹ In such ways did popular poetry revenge itself on reality. The king is not responsible for the forest law ; he rather disapproves of it ; and he is full of indulgence for poachers.

During the thirteenth century, in fact, poaching was not very severely treated. Article 10 of the Charter was

1. Turner, pp. 34, 35, 42. 2. Ibid., p. 40. 3. Ibid., p. 34.

4. Ibid., pp. 8, 17, 39, 77, 80, 99.

5. "Equites et pedites" (ibid., p. 22).

6. Ibid., pp. 8, 28, 38-9, 77, 80-1.

7. Statutum de malefactoribus in parcis (Statutes i, 111-2). This statute applies to the chases of the nobles as well as to the king's Forest.

8. See the cycle of the ballads of Robin Hood (12th-15th century) in vol. v. of English and Scottish Popular Ballads, published by F. J. Child ; cf. his introduction, p. 42.

9. This story, attributed to Chaucer, probably dates from the 13th century. Dr. Skeat has not included it in his edition of Chaucer, but has published it separately.

leniently enforced. The "heavy ransom" was fixed in proportion to the means of the guilty person, and seldom exceeded six or seven shillings. The fine was really "heavy" only when it was imposed on a delinquent of good family, or on an official, a verderer for instance, who had betrayed his trust by taking the king's beasts for himself. Poor men were often pardoned or set at liberty in consideration of the detention they had undergone before their trial.¹ Poachers, in short, seem in the thirteenth century to have been treated with a relative leniency which cannot have made for the diminution of their numbers.

Nevertheless the administration and the justice of the Forest remained irritating and unpopular because evil-doers were not the only ones punished. To pass through the Forest with hunting-dogs which frightened the game was enough to send a man to gaol.² One man was prosecuted for "having stupidly entered the forest with a bow and arrows."³ A boy found a dead fawn and carried it away, not knowing that he was doing wrong; he was kept in prison for over a year.⁴ At the smallest indication of anything amiss, an inquisition was set on foot, and the four nearest townships had to find and produce the culprit. Whether it was a question of a landowner who had let his dogs run loose or of a poacher who after shooting a forester had fled under cover of darkness, mattered nothing; if the townships "did not come fully," as it was put—that is to say, if they did not accuse anyone—they had to pay a fine of at least 6s. 8d., and often as much as six marks.⁵

Thus offenders who were caught got off lightly, and the law-abiding inhabitants paid for those who escaped.

1. For details see Turner, pp. lxx-vi., [and also Miss Bazeley, op. cit., pp. 109 sqq., where there is some extremely interesting matter on poaching in the Forest of Dean in the 13th century.]

2. Turner, p. 31. 3. Ibid., p. 17. 4. Ibid., p. 29.

5. Ibid., pp. 18, 28, etc., and Introduction, pp. xlvi, lxiii.

Tyranny and extortion of the foresters

The unpopularity of the whole forest system was rendered complete by the violence and exactions of the foresters. Some in their zeal collected illegal fines for the exchequer. Others were extortionate for their own advantage. In Rutland the warden of the Forest set the example: an extant record enumerates the arbitrary imprisonments inflicted by Peter de Neville to wring money from the inhabitants, and tells how on fanciful pretexts he levied fines, which he of course forgot to hand over to the exchequer.¹ The unlawful holding of pleas was also one of the most common complaints. Chapter xxi of the Instructions of 1244 concerns this abuse of power: "Item, to enquire if foresters-in-fee or others have held any plea of the vert or the venison, which belongs to the king and his chief justice; to discover those who have thus received fines and amercements, and which and how much."² But the inhabitants had to suffer many other kinds of extortion, and the foresters-in-fee were not the only, or even the chief, offenders. Being well off, they were not much feared by the people,³ who were far more afraid of the insatiable greed of the subordinate officers. Through desire of gain, the wardens of the forests appointed foresters in much greater numbers than were necessary; these bought their offices and also paid an annual ferm to the warden.⁴ Sometimes they were actually dismissed as soon as appointed, that their posts might be sold again to others.⁵ Naturally, the under-foresters, liable to such extortions, were extortionate in their turn.

1. Turner, pp. 49 sqq. 2. M. Paris, vi, Additamenta, 98.

3. The inhabitants preferred the foresters-in-fee (Turner, p. cxxxix).

4. "La met le chef forester les foresters suz ly, a chival e a pe, a suen voler, saunz le veue de nuly, e plus ke ne suffist a garder la Forest dreiturele, par le lur donaunt sicum il puent finir pur aver baylye, a graunt damage e a grevaunce del pays" (Grievances of the People of Somerset, 1279, in Turner, p. 126, § 4; cf. also p. 128, § 8).

5. In the chapters of the Inquisition of 1244 this dishonest traffic is attributed to the foresters-in-fee, who indeed did in many places nominate the under-foresters (M. Paris, vi, Additamenta, 96; cf. Fleta, ii, c. 41, § 36).

The "grievances of the people and commonalty of the forests in Somerset" give us a clear idea of the abuses complained of in 1279 by the inhabitants of a single county. They speak only of acts contrary to the Charter of the Forest.

Grievances of the people of Somerset

They were forced to pay ancient dues for assart, waste, and purpresture, from which article 4 exempted them. In some districts they were deprived of the right of pasture.¹ They were summoned to the swanimote, with a view to the subsequent amercement of defaulters. The officers ordered the complete mutilation of the paws of their dogs. They levied tolls prohibited by the Charter. Furthermore, the unmounted foresters came to the villages in August claiming sheaves, lambs, young pigs, wool, and linen : with the grain given them they brewed beer and forced the peasants to buy it.² And after them came their mounted colleagues, and did the same.³

It is not astonishing that the hatred of the peasants for the foresters continued unabated, and even led them to bring against their oppressors false accusations of stealing the king's deer and wood.⁴

On the subject of corrupt foresters, the king and the nation were necessarily in agreement, for, to use the ingenuous but weighty argument of the people of Somerset, "from these things the king has no profit."⁵ That is why Henry III

Punishment of extortion and Edward I ordered inquisitions into the conduct of the foresters. During his progress in 1244 and 1245, Robert Passelewe dealt with the case of the prothoforestarius, the justice John de Neville, whose place, moreover, he wanted to get.

Inquisitions under Henry III

Notwithstanding the support he received,

1. See also on the question of common of pasture, the grievances put forward by the people of Huntingdonshire in 1255 (Turner, pp. 25-6).

2. This is an example of the abuse of "scotale." See above, p. 196.

3. Turner, pp. 125 sqq.

4. "Odio et hatya" (ibid., p. 37).

5. Turner, p. 128.

John was "shamefully convicted, and from being rich became wretched"; he was pitied by nobody because he had been without pity for others.¹ The inquisition of 1253 in Northamptonshire was concerned, among other matters, with the conduct of the foresters.² The general eyre of 1269—1271 was instituted mainly to deal with the same subject, and it was then that discovery was made of the peculation and extortion of Peter de Neville, warden of the forest of Rutland. Peter de Neville succeeded in getting out of his evil plight; and his outlawry in 1273 was for another offence.³

It is well known with what thoroughness Edward I administered his own affairs and those of his subjects. Resolved as he was to keep in touch with every branch of the administration, he turned his attention to the Forest soon after he came back to England in 1274 and assumed the reins of government. As early as 1277 he ordered a great inquisition in the forests south of the Trent, declaring that he wished the Charter of the Forest to be observed in all its articles,⁴ and in the following years he instituted similar inquiries,⁵ which sometimes led to the removal of officers.⁶ The lawyer who about 1290 wrote Fleta has preserved the list of the questions which were put by the commissioners: they had in particular to enquire if the foresters were too numerous, if they levied illegal requisitions, and if they made profits for themselves at the expense of the exchequer.⁷

These inquisitions of the first part of the reign encouraged the presentation of lists of grievances, like

1. M. Paris, iv. 401, 427.
2. Turner, pp. 108 sqq.
3. Ibid., pp. 43 sqq.; Introduction, pp. xvii, lxviii sqq.
4. The letters-patent are dated 1 March, 1277 (C.P.R. 1272-81, p. 237).
5. See an example of the thirteenth year of the reign (Turner, p. lxix, n. 4).
6. As, e.g., of Robert of Everingham, in Sherwood Forest (ibid., p. 66).
7. Fleta, ch. 41.

Edward I's Assize the Gravamina of "the people of Somerset," and resulted—as early as 1278, if we are to believe Manwood¹—in the publication of the Consuetudines et Assise de Foresta. This document summarises very briefly the existing customs and laws concerning trespasses to the vert and the venison, the procedure of the courts, the duties of the inhabitants and of the foresters with a view to the preservation of the game, and so forth.² Theoretically, this forest code was still in force in the sixteenth century, and Manwood translated the whole of it in his treatise.

The Consuetudines et Assise were intended to safeguard the rights of the king and not those of the inhabitants of the Forest. We get the impression that this was almost exclusively Edward's aim when he instituted forest inquisitions during the first part of his reign. It was likewise the chief concern of his itinerant justices. This is clearly shown by the Provisions published in 1287 by William de Vescy, justice of the Forest north of the Trent: their sole object is to ensure the strict suppression of offences.³

Stubbs expresses astonishment at the violence of the complaints raised in 1297, at the time when the king was trying to collect money and troops in order to fight Philip the Fair in Gascony and Flanders. In his opinion, Edward I had governed according to the spirit of the Charters and the charge of having violated them was "vague declamation."⁴ With regard to the Forest, we have just seen that the royal administration was open

1. "There is no indication," says M. Bémont, "that Manwood imagined this date" (Chartes des lib. ang., Introd., p. lxxv, n. 4). Nevertheless Manwood may have simply assumed that the issue of the Consuetudines took place immediately after the inquisition of 1277. M. Bémont remarks elsewhere (p. 97, n. 1) that in the old manuscript collections of statutes this document is placed among those of 1290-91. Cf. Mr. Turner's observations (p. xxxvii, n. 4). According to him the first eleven articles date from the beginning of the reign of Henry III, or even from the reign of John.

2. Statutes, i, 243 sqq. 3. Turner, pp. 62 sqq.

4. Stubbs, Const. Hist., ed. 1896, ii, 150 sqq.

to criticism : it was not in agreement with the spirit of forbearance and equity which inspired the Charter of 1217 and guided Henry III's Council of Regency ; it was still, as under the personal rule of Henry III, narrowly jealous of its rights and careless of the sufferings endured by the inhabitants of the Forest. It was therefore natural that these should accuse Edward of not keeping the promises of his father, and that when in a moment of exasperation the nation drew up its list of grievances, they should add a clause of their own.

On 16 July, 1297, at the time when the marshal and the constable had just refused to serve overseas, archbishop Winchelsey summoned his clergy to deliberate on the need of a confirmation of the "great charters of liberties and of the Forest,"¹ and some days later the king promised to confirm them in return for an aid.² In a manifesto which was circulated at this juncture, the opposition complained of the violation of the Charter and of the Assize of the Forest, laying stress on illegal attachments.³

When the king had sailed for Flanders, his opponents succeeded in obtaining guarantees not only against arbitrary impositions, but against the severities of the

1. " . . . Articulus arduus videlicet de Magnis Cartis libertatum et Foreste salubriter innovandis, et de iuribus ac libertatibus ecclesie Anglicane, que hactenus deciderunt et adhuc continue decidunt in abusum, recuperandis a principe " (Parl. Writs, i, 53).

2. " . . . Pur aver le confermement de la graunt chartre des fraunchises d'Engleterre et de la chartre de la Forest, lequeu confermement le roy leur ad graunté bonement, si li graunterent un commun doun tel com lui est mult besoynnable ou poynt de ore " (Royal proclamation of 12 Aug. 1297: Bémont, Chartes, pp. 83-4). We have adopted the chronology established by M. Bémont in the excellent Introduction to his collection (p. xxxvii). It is, indeed, not at all probable that the reconciliation of the king and the archbishop occurred, as Stubbs supposes, on 14 July—that is to say, before the despatch of the summons cited above.

3. " . . . Preter hec, communitas terre sentit nimis se gravatam de assisa foreste, que non est custodita sicut consuevit, nec charta foreste observatur ; sed fiunt attachiamenta pro libitu extra assisam aliter quam fieri solebant " (Articuli quos comites petierunt nomine communitatis, art. 5: Bémont, op. cit., p. 78). On this manifesto, cf. Bémont, p. xxxviii, and Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii, 143.

forest administration. As early as 10 October, the regency granted them the Confirmatio Cartarum; the document was sent to Edward, who surrounded by difficulties as he was, could do nothing but agree to it. He sealed it with the great seal at Ghent, on 5 November. In the first article the king confirmed, along with Magna Carta, the Charter of the Forest, gave orders that it should be sent to all the counties and put into force by all officials and justices, according to the Assize of the Forest, that is to say, in agreement with the rules laid down in the Consuetudines et Assise Foreste.¹ On 26 November he initiated inquisitions in twenty-four counties; since they were being made for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Forest, these were to bear the expense.² But the Confirmatio Cartarum and this inquisition, like those which had been held before, led to no radical change in the forest system.

After experiencing so many disappointments, the English had good reason to think that the only effectual means of diminishing abuses was to diminish the Forest itself. And indeed, after 1298, the quarrel about the Forest, at the same time that it grew more bitter, became a quarrel about disafforestation. Men were much less concerned to obtain the punishment of guilty foresters than to limit the operation of the evil by making the Forest smaller. This question of disafforestation must now be the chief object of our enquiry and the subject of a separate chapter. But before showing its importance at the end of the reign of Edward I, it will be necessary to look back. In 1298 it had become a problem crying for solution, but it had been in existence long before. During the whole of the thirteenth century, the English had never ceased to demand the execution of the promises made on this matter in Magna Carta and the Charter of the Forest.

1. Bémont, op. cit., pp. 96 sqq. 2. Parl. Writs, i, 396-7.

THE STRUGGLE FOR DISAFFORESTMENT.

Despite a few picturesque details furnished by judicial records, what has just been said about the Forest in the reigns of Henry III and Edward I is in many respects somewhat commonplace and not at all peculiar to English history. Encroachments at the expense of the Forest, the stealing of game, the annoyances experienced by the inhabitants, the exactions of the foresters, the intermittent efforts of the crown to obtain a better administration—these are facts which can for the most part be found in French documents of the same period, such as the reports of the inquisitors appointed by St. Louis, decisions of the Parlement, or royal letters. In France also a long peace, the increase of population, and agricultural prosperity, led to encroachments on the Forest by rural landholders. In France also there were poachers, both professional and amateur, and among them many ecclesiastics and foresters. In France also brutal means were used by the officials to protect the forests and warrens from unlawful injury. Trespasses were punished even more severely perhaps than in England, and without question more arbitrarily, for the machinery of forest justice worked with much less regularity, and complaints against unjust fines were innumerable. Encroachments were forbidden; compensation for purpresture was exacted; the extension of customary rights was opposed, and very often attempts were made to curtail those which had existed from time immemorial. In France also there were corrupt and oppressive foresters, and extortionate serjeants: and an inquisition concerning a verderer of the Forest of Brix¹ makes a fitting companion to the case of Peter de Neville.

In England, however, the history of the Forest has an importance which it entirely lacks in France. In Eng-

Why the Forest was of political importance in England alone land it plays a part in the history of the great constitutional crises. The reason is that immense tracts had been afforested to the advantage of the crown, whereas in France the hunting preserves of the Capetians were of modest extent. During the thirteenth century a problem which gave no trouble in France, was already causing serious disputes in England: the king wished to maintain his Forest, and his people demanded at least its partial surrender. It was principally the struggle for disafforestation which connected the history of the Forest with the history of the English constitution.

In resisting the demand, the king was not only fighting for his prerogative, for the continuance of the arbitrary

Why the king refused to surrender the Forest jurisdiction so precisely defined by the author of the Dialogus de Scaccario: he was also fighting for his Treasury. He was loth to lose the fruits of forest justice, the rents for assarts, the great profits derived from the sale of game. It must not be overlooked that in the thirteenth century red deer, fallow deer, and roes, killed and salted by the king's huntsmen, were sold by the hundred.² The Forest was certainly the source of a large income. The whole of it was not necessary for the king's sport, for no king ever hunted in all his forests, but it was necessary if the royal budget was to balance.³

1. Cartulaire normand, no. 1222 (A.D. 1272).

2. In a single day four hundred of these beasts were killed by Edward I and his huntsmen in the forest of Inglewood. The pipe rolls of Henry III record the wages paid for killing and salting, for instance, 235 roes, or 200 harts, or 200 hinds (F. H. M. Parker, Forest Laws, Eng. Hist. Rev., 1912, p. 29). [See also the interesting details given by Miss Bazeley, p. 239.]

3. [In regard to the financial value of the Forest, see Miss Bazeley's careful analysis of the revenue derived from the Forest of Dean. She concludes that, between the years 1155 and 1307, the average income from this forest was about £75 per annum (op. cit., chap. iii).]

In view of this, the king might justly have charged his opponents with putting forward two inconsistent claims : they grumbled because he kept his Forest, and, on the other hand, they called on him to refrain from extraordinary taxation, to "live of his own," and not to alienate the revenues of the crown.

But the forest system was excessively irksome, even in the thirteenth century, to all who held land within its sphere. Whether they were peasants or great landlords, they paid fines and rents, and were constantly exposed to interference, both in developing their property and in their daily lives. In general they had not even the satisfaction of hunting the game which fed on their lands; for, in the thirteenth century, licenses to hunt in the Forest were with few exceptions granted only within the narrow limits prescribed by the Charter.¹ The Assize of Edward I expressly mentions that the abbot of Peterborough has the right of hunting the hare, fox, and rabbit in the Forest and of keeping unlicensed dogs, showing that at this time no other magnate enjoyed these privileges.² To estimate the discontent which must have been felt, we need only recall how great a part was played by the chase in the life of a mediæval man. It was the favourite sport of the nobles; in time of peace it offered a substitute for war, and was as dear to their hearts as the tournament itself. It likewise gave enjoyment to the middle and poorer classes. Moreover, for the people as well as for the king, hunting was not only a pastime but also a source of profit. The venison, the fur, the skins had much more value than now as food, clothing, and writing material. Every class of the nation was interested in the curtailment of the Forest as a step towards its complete abolition.

1. See the lists of game taken by bishops, earls, and barons in accordance with Article 2 of the Charter or by special writ, and also the references to gifts of game, in Turner, pp. 92-3, 95, 98, 102, 104, 105, 108, 113.

2. Statutes, i, 245. Edward I granted to the Bishop of Winchester the right to hunt in the Forest, but only within the limits of the episcopal demesne. (Rot. Parl., i. 25).

Of all the inhabitants of the Forest, the small landholders no doubt suffered most from the law, but ~~there~~ is no ground for astonishment in the fact that, as we shall see, the nobility almost always took the lead in the fight for disafforestation. They alone had enough authority to demand a diminution of the rights of the crown, and, in this particular case, they were directly interested in their object. The commons took no prominent part in the struggle, although it was a matter of intense importance to many poor people. Their inaction is the less remarkable if we remember the obstinate humility with which, during the Hundred Years' War, they constantly refused to express an opinion on the question of peace with France.

In the first quarter of the thirteenth century, it might have been thought that the Forest would be quickly reduced within reasonable limits. At first to cope with the pressing need of money, and afterwards to conciliate its enemies in very critical circumstances, the crown had made promises and had begun to execute them. But when Henry III came of age, a reaction set in, and disafforestation seemed so injurious to the royal finances that even some of the concessions that had been made were revoked.

The early history of disafforestation is lost in the night of time. It probably begins with the history of the Forest itself. In the Assize of Woodstock Henry II speaks of "woods and other places disafforested by him and his ancestors."¹ It is clear that most of these ancient disafforestments had a financial motive. At all events, we know that Richard I had recourse to this method of

Why the nobles took the lead in the struggle

Vicissitudes of the Forest in the 13th century

Early disafforestments

1. Art. 16; Sel. Charters, p. 188.

raising money¹ and that John followed his example. Roger of Wendover tells us that when Philip Augustus was conquering Normandy and Poitou, John, finding his subjects unwilling to follow him for the recovery of his lost heritage, oppressed them in a thousand ways.²

The charter rolls prove that one of his devices for raising money was the surrender of parts of the Forest. We have a series of documents, dated March and May 1204, which disafforest the New Forest of Staffordshire, the Forest of Brewood in Shropshire, nearly all Cornwall and Devon, part of Essex, and other districts.³ It is known that the homines de Essex gave 500 marks for the disafforestments which were conceded to them,⁴ and that, at the forest pleas of 1209, the inhabitants of Brewood Forest paid 100 marks to obtain the execution of the Charter of disafforestation granted in 1204.⁵ During the crisis of 1215, three weeks before the granting of Magna Carta, when John was trying by a partial surrender to break up the coalition formed against him, he promised to abandon what remained of the Forest in Cornwall.⁶ On the other hand, when Magna Carta was forced on him by the barons, he succeeded, as we have seen, in evading all compromising pledges on this subject.

During the ten years after the death of John, Henry III's Council of Regency, having granted the Charter of the Forest, applied it faithfully, the articles on disafforestation included. They might have postponed the execution of these clauses, for it was a rule

Disafforestments during Henry III's minority

1. A reference in the pipe rolls of Richard I and the report of a perambulation made on 5 March, 1300, show that Richard at the beginning of his reign disafforested part of Surrey, and that in return the knights of that county gave him 300 marks. (The documents are published by Turner, pp. 117, 118, n. 1.)

2. Wendover in M. Paris, ed. cit. ii, 483.

3. Rot. Chartarum (ed. Hardy), pp. 122-3, 128, 132.

4. Round, Forest of Essex, loc. cit. pp. 40-1.

5. Turner, pp. 9, 10 n. 1.

6. See the charter of 22 April, 1215 (Rot. Chart., p. 206).

of English law that a minor was not competent to make an irrevocable grant of land, and an ordinance of 1218 laid down that the young king could make no gift in perpetuity during his minority.¹ Now it was a considerable gift to surrender the forest rights of the crown over vast territories. Nevertheless, as early as 1218 and 1219, perambulationes, or pourallées, were instituted, in view of the impending disafforestments,² and others were set on foot when, on 11 February 1225, the Charter of the Forest was re-published. Some districts were certainly disafforested after these inquisitions, but there is little trace of their results.³

When on 9 January 1227, Henry III declared himself of age, did he intend, as Stubbs believes,⁴ to revoke the Charter, or, at least, to demand money for executing the clauses concerning disafforestation? According to the narrative of Roger of Wendover, the earls who rebelled in July 1227, accused him of having "cancelled the charters of the liberties of the Forest."⁵ In 1258 the "earls and barons" complained that he had "reafforested" woods and lands not contained within the bounds of the Forest: these woods and lands had been

Reaction when Henry came of age

Did Henry III revoke
the Charter?

1. G. J. Turner, Minority of Henry III., in Trans. Royal Hist. Soc., New Series, xviii (1904), 280. The ordinance is in Rymer, Record ed., i, pt. i, p. 152.

2. Patent Rolls, 1216-25, p. 162: On 24 July, 1218, writs were sent to the sheriffs and letters-patent to John le Marshal, capitalis iusticiarius de Foresta Anglie, commissioned to superintend the disafforestments in accordance with the charter; see also (p. 178) the writ of 9 Nov., 1218, and (pp. 190 sqq., 193, 197 et passim) the letters of 1219 on disafforestments in various counties.

3. Turner, Sel. Pleas, pp. xciv sqq. An extract from the pipe rolls (quoted ibid., p. xcv, n. 8) proves that the cost of carrying out the disafforestments was borne by the inhabitants of the counties affected.

4. Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii, 40.

5. "[Comites] addiderunt insuper, regi denuntiantes atrociter, ut cartas, quas nuper apud Oxoniam cancellaverat, de libertatibus forestae, sibi absque dilacione restitueret sigillatas. Sin autem ipsi illum gladiis discurrantibus compellerent, ut sibi super his satisfaceret competenter. Tunc rex statuit illis apud Norhamtonam tertio nonas Augusti diem, ut ibi faceret eis plenam rectitudinem exhiberi" (M. Paris, ed. cit., iii. 125).

disafforested as a result of the "perambulation of good men" and in fulfilment of the promise made by the king¹ in return for the fifteenth of all the movable goods of his subjects. This complaint, which appears in the famous petition presented at the parliament of Oxford,² was well-founded, but it must not be thought that in 1227, as Wendover asserts, the Charter had been revoked.³ What happened was this. In a certain number of counties, the knights charged with the perambulation had disafforested districts which had indeed been made forest by Henry II after his coronation, but which had already formed part of the Forest under Henry I, before the disafforestments of the reign of Stephen. Henry III considered that it was just to restore these districts to the Forest, and took measures accordingly.⁴

The explanation given by Stubbs, generally so accu-

1. The reference is to the confirmation of the Charter of the Forest dated 11 Feb., 1225. Henry explicitly stated that for this confirmation and that of the Great Charter his subjects had given him a fifteenth of their movable goods (see the document in Bémont, Chartes, p. 69, n. 5).

2. Sel. Charters, p. 374, art. 7.

3. Lingard (History of England, 6th ed., ii, 196, n. 3) and Pauli (Geschichte von England, ed. 1853, iii, 564, n. 3) observe that no document confirms this assertion and that some contradict it.

4. See the letters of the king to Henry de Neville, 9 Feb., 1227: The knights charged with the perambulation in Leicestershire have admitted before the king "quod ipsi in perambulatione illa transgressi sunt, decepti ex eo quod breve nostrum de perambulatione illa faciendi eis transmissum continebat quod ipsi deafforestarent omnes boscos quos H. rex avus noster afforestaverit, et non exceptit eos qui ante tempus suum foresta fuerunt et quos ipse postea ad forestam revocavit; unde credebant quod tam deafforestandi fuerunt bosci quos ipse ad forestam revocavit quam illi quos de novo afforestavit." There are similar letters concerning the perambulations in Rutland and Huntingdonshire (Rot. Lit. Claus., ed. Hardy, ii, 169); also letters of 20 April, 1228, pardoning the knights charged with the perambulations in Lancashire, Staffordshire, Surrey, Salop, Northants, and Worcestershire, "qui recognoverunt quod ipsi in perambulatione illa erga nos per ignorantiam et errorem transgressi sunt" (Pat. Rolls, 1225-1232, p. 184). Cf. the similar letters for the commissioners in Yorkshire (ibid., p. 225). It is significant that in 1220 the Council of Regency was already asking if the perambulation of the Forest between the Ouse and the Derwent could be accepted: "utrum perambulacio ipsius Foreste iuste facta fuerit" (ibid., 1216-1226, 231). Doubts were also felt in 1226 (Turner, xcvi, n. 8).

rate, is therefore quite erroneous. He has confused—at least by his method of stating them—facts belonging to different categories. In his eyes the revocation of the disafforestments in 1227 was “merely a means for raising money; £100,000 was obtained by the repurchase of the grants imperilled; a tallage was asked of the towns and demesne lands of the crown, and the charters remained in force.” If reference be made to the authorities which he cites, neither those which relate to the confirmation of the concessions, nor those which concern the tallage, make any mention of disafforestation.

It is the more necessary to ascertain and remember the principle laid down by Henry III in 1227, because his successors, Edward I in particular, appealed to it in their turn when defending the Forest. The Plantagenets, in short, claimed the right of keeping the districts which Henry I had afforested and which the weakness of Stephen had allowed to slip back for some years into the sphere of the common law. This claim was of doubtful validity. At his accession Stephen had solemnly renounced all the forests made by Henry I, and in article 1 of the Charter of 1217 it was simply said that the woods afforested by Henry II outside the demesne were to be disafforested. The opposition therefore had good grounds for arguing that the lands afforested under Henry I and disafforested under Stephen were no legal part of the Forest—those in the royal demesne excepted—and that lands disafforested by Stephen ought not to be retained in the Forest unless they had already belonged to it in the time of William Rufus. It is not certain, however, that the questions in dispute were so precisely stated, or that the validity of Stephen’s charter was a subject of discussion.

At all events, the measures adopted by Henry III were regarded as a violation of the promises made in 1217.

Stubbs’ version

Questionable validity of the principle laid down by Henry III

Unpopularity
of his action

When the limitation of an abuse has been granted, such vacillation in executing the reforms is not likely to be tolerated, whatever legal justification it may claim. Hence the indignation of the barons, whom Wendover represents as protesting, in July, 1227, against the abolition of the "Charters of the liberties of the Forest," demanding their restitution, and threatening the king with an appeal to arms. From this account, which is certainly inaccurate, nothing can be concluded except that the barons were annoyed at the announcement, made at the beginning of the year, that certain disafforestments were to be revoked. Henry may have given fair promises to appease them, but he none the less persisted in the resumption of districts which had been unduly disafforested.¹ Twenty years later this was still one of the complaints urged against him. At the Mad Parliament, as we have just said, the barons called upon him to surrender these districts once and for all. They complained also that the king had granted rights of warren on disafforested lands, maintaining that on these the chase should be free.² Their recriminations seem to have led to no result.

When Edward I came to the throne, articles 1 and 3 of the charter were still only in part carried out: the forests created since the accession of Henry II had not all been disafforested.³ Certain woods which ought to have been disafforested, say the people of Somerset in their complaints of 1279, remain in the Forest, "contrary to the Charter and to the grievance of the country."⁴

The situation
at Edward I's accession

1. Turner, p. ci. We have an example in the re-afforestation of Essex (Fisher, Forest of Essex, pp. 25 sqq.).

2. Sel. Charters, p. 374, arts. 7 and 9.

3. The only counties which had been entirely freed from the forest law by Henry III were Leicestershire and Sussex. Middlesex may be added if we count the suppression of the warren of Staines (Turner, p. cvii).

4. Turner, p. 125.

In letters-patent of 1 March 1277,¹ as we have said above, Edward I announced his resolve to keep the Charter of the Forest inviolably, and ordered an inquisition in the Forests south of the Trent. This inquisition was instituted not only to discover and repress abuses, but also to "make the perambulation," in obedience to the Charter. Nevertheless, the royal commissions and the juries were "to make a just perambulation, namely, that which was made in the time of the lord king Henry our father, which has not yet been impugned."² This clause meant that they had to limit themselves to decisions made by the commissioners of Henry III.³ The king added that no executive measures were to be taken until reference had been made to him. In a word, he granted a perambulation, but he was resolved that the limits of the Forest should remain as they were fixed by his predecessor.

Edward's subjects refused to be satisfied with this illusory concession. The perambulations of Exmoor Forest, published by Mr. Greswell in an English translation, show that the struggle for disafforestation was already beginning to be waged between Edward and his people. In 1279 the jurors strove to prove that a large district, comprising at least half of this forest, ought to be disafforested. They alleged that this region had been included in the Forest by John, surrendered by Henry III, "when a fifteenth of the movable goods of all England was given him,"⁴ and again afforested by the

1. C.P.R., 1272-81, i, 237. One of these letters has been published in the Introduction to the Select Pleas (p. cii). Mr. Turner has not stated whether the inquisition led to any definite result, nor has he mentioned the very typical perambulations of the Forest of Exmoor, which are well worth publishing in their original text.

2. "... ut fiat perambulacio recta, illa scilicet que facta fuit tempore domini Henrici regis patris nostri, que nondum calumpniata fuit."

3. This is proved by a document cited by Greswell, Forests of Somerset, p. 275.

4. In 1225; see above, p. 215.

forester-in-fee, Richard de Wrotham, "to the great damage of the whole country and without profit to the king." A second perambulation made in the same year by another jury curtailed still further the part which the king had a right to keep. There is decisive documentary evidence that Edward I retained Exmoor Forest in its full extent.¹ Throughout his life he was to play the same game of granting and then taking back. It is perhaps in this quarrel about disafforestation that his leaning towards chicane and subterfuge appears most clearly.

In 1297 the departure of the king for Flanders left the field clear for the opposition. Like the Council which had governed during the minority of Henry III, the regents who were at the head of affairs during Edward's absence adopted a conciliatory policy. Some days after the grant of the Confirmatio Cartarum, and even before it was ratified by the king, the regency ordered perambulations to be made,² and it is at least certain that they were carried out in Hampshire and Somerset. Mr. Greswell has published the record of the perambulations made, in March and May, 1298, in the Somersetshire forests of Selwood, Neroche, and Mendip.³ But just at this moment Edward came back to England determined on resistance. Then began the great battle for disafforestation.

Perambulations
authorised by the regency
in 1297

1. Greswell, Forests of Somerset, pp. 171 sqq. See the map, p. 176. Mr. Greswell is not sure that the perambulations of 1279 were not put into effect: but the documents which he publishes on pp. 176-9 (perambulation of 1298) and pp. 199 sqq. (seizure of the wood of Dulverton in 1291) prove clearly that they never were.—In 1280 Edward I disafforested Northumberland, but only in consideration of an annual rent of forty pounds (Turner, p. cviii). In 1300 this county appears among those which have no forest (Parl. Writs, i, 91).

2. In the first instance, in the letters-patent of 16 Oct., 1297 (C.P.R., 1292-1301, p. 312) the regent copied the wording of the letters of 1 March, 1277, which we have cited above, including the limitation of the commissioners to the "perambulacio recta;" but this restriction was afterwards withdrawn. See Turner, p. ciii.

3. Op. cit., App. B, pp. 265 sqq. The unpublished perambulation of Hampshire is referred to by Turner, p. ciii, n. 6.

At Whitsuntide 1298, Edward's opponents, led by the earls of Norfolk and Hereford, demanded a new confirmation of the charters and a general limitation of the Forest.¹ Now that the king was back, they expected that everything would have to be done over again. Edward justified their mistrust. First, he asked for time. Then, on 18 November, he appointed a commission, consisting of three bishops, two earls, and two knights, "to investigate and examine" the misdeeds of justices, foresters, verderers, and other officers of the forests throughout the realm. But nothing was said in the writ about disafforestation.² Next year, after much tergiversation, he appeared to be giving way before the threat of civil war,³ and on 2 April he commanded the sheriffs⁴ to enforce the observance of the Great Charter and the Charter of the Forest, the latter "according to the articles written below": a copy of the charter was annexed, from which the articles regarding disafforestation were omitted. Edward added, it is true, that he wished the perambulation to be made, but saving his oath and the rights of his crown, and he intended to have the report of the commissioners submitted to him before any part of the Forest was surrendered. Finally, he asked for a further postponement of the perambulation: it should be made as soon as possible, when once he had completed the negotiations with the envoys who would shortly arrive from Rome on business which concerned all Christendom—namely, the Crusade.

These reservations and dilatory measures aroused an indignation which alarmed him. He gave way, as he

1. Blackstone, Magna Carta, Introd., p. lxxviii. 2. Parl. Writs, i, 397.
3. At the Parliament of 8 March, 1299. Cf. Bémont, Introd., pp. xlv sqq.

4. In the instructions, inserted in the statute rolls, which are known as the Statutum de finibus levatis (Statutes, i, 126 sqq.). See the passages cited by Bémont (p. lxxv, n. 2) and Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii, 154, n. 4.

Anger of the barons.
Parliament of May, 1299 always did when he feared a complete breach with his subjects. On 3 May, he again called together the barons and prelates, whom he had just dismissed, and this time, according to a chronicler, he granted "everything" and pledged himself afresh to initiate a perambulation.¹ On 25 June, in a proclamation to his subjects, he complained of being so hardly pressed; he had to deal with urgent matters which would occupy him till the middle of July; the perambulation, moreover, could scarcely be made at the time of harvest; his people ought not to believe malicious reports, circulated to sow dissension between the king and his subjects; he promised that the commissioners for the perambulation should meet in Northampton at Michaelmas.² And on 23 September he did in fact nominate five of his most experienced judges, Roger de Brabazon, John de Berwick, Ralph de Hingham, William Inge, and John de Croxley, who during the winter were to make the perambulation in Northants, Huntingdonshire, Rutland, Oxfordshire, and Surrey.³

Perambulation of 1299-1300 The evidence of the juries appears to have been honestly given, and conscientiously recorded by the commission.⁴

Nevertheless, king and nation still distrusted each other, as is shown by the articles published after the Parliament of March, 1300. The king was forced to recognise that, for want of special safeguards, the charters had never been faithfully observed by the royal officials, and a demand was made for the appointment of elective commissions similar to those which had been forced on King

1. Trivet, Annales, ed. Hog, pp. 375-6.

2. C.P.R., 1292-1301, p. 424; Blackstone, op. cit. p. lxix.

3. Turner, p. civ; the report of the perambulation in Rutland (7 Dec., 1299) is to be found on pp. 116-117; that for Surrey (5 March, 1300) on pp. 117-118.

4. In Rutland the jurors mentioned a district afforested by John. In Surrey they declared that they knew of no afforestation made since the accession of Henry II.

John. Though at heart determined to surrender nothing of his prerogative, Edward pretended to yield. In the Articuli super Cartas, he declared that the Charter of the Forest, as well as the Great Charter, ought to be kept, observed, and maintained in full, and read in every county four times a year; neither had "been kept or observed heretofore, because no penalties were hitherto established for offenders against the points of the aforesaid charters"; in future, therefore, every county should elect "three good men, knights or others, loyal, wise, and discreet, who shall be sworn as justices and commissioned by the king's letters patent under his great seal" to hear and determine, without delay, complaints against those who violate the two charters, and even to punish the guilty "by imprisonment, ransom, or amercement."¹ As early as 27 March writs were sent ordering the elections to be made,² and on 10 May Edward invested the commissioners with the powers specified in the Articuli.³

It seems improbable that these commissioners were of much use, for it was laid down, both in the Articuli and in the writ of 10 May, that they were not to hold pleas "in cases where aforetime remedy was provided by writ according to the common law." It was contrary to the king's wishes "that prejudice should be caused to the common law, or to the aforesaid charters in any of their points." The commissioners were thus forewarned that they would run grave risk of committing illegalities and displeasing the king if they tried to perform their duties. The Articuli, moreover, ended with the inevitable reser-

The king still reserves his rights

1. Articuli super cartas (Bémont, pp. 99 sqq.).

2. Blackstone, op. cit. p. lxx.

3. Parl. Writs, i, 398 sqq. These writs were addressed to commissions of three in thirty-six counties. They concern the enforcement both of Magna Carta and the Charter of the Forest, and of the Statute of Winchester for the conservation of the peace. Among these thirty-six counties appears Kent, where there was no forest.

vation : " In all and each of the aforesaid matters, it is the will and intention of the king and of his council and of all those present when this ordinance was made, that the right and lordship of the crown shall be entirely preserved."

It was in the same spirit of pettifogging resistance that, on 1 April of the same year, the king appointed six new commissions to make perambulations in eighteen counties. He still reserved the rights of the crown, and he ordered Hugh le Despenser and Robert de Clifford, the two justices of the Forest, to be present at the perambulations in their respective jurisdictions, or to send a deputy : it was his wish that all the foresters-in-fee and verderers should be summoned, and everybody who could help in ascertaining the truth.¹ The commissioners no doubt understood what the king expected of them. The juries, however, did not allow themselves to be intimidated : so at least we can infer from the report of the perambulation in Warwickshire, where the jurors declared that there was no forest in the county at the accession of Henry II, and that the forests had been made by John, to the injury of the landholders.²

Edward was now reduced to the necessity of either accepting the result of these inquisitions, with the financial disasters that would follow, or running the risk of a complete breach with the opposition, now led with no little courage by Archbishop Winchelsey. Did the king really believe that he was being wronged, and that by his resistance he was upholding his rights? In this year 1300, after his recent experience of what had happened at the inquisitions, he was, we think, sincere. The assertions of the juries, it seemed to him, were based simply on " the

Perambulations
of 1300

The king's attitude

1. Parl. Writs, i, 397-8.

2. Perambulation of 29 June, 1300 (Turner, pp. 120-1).

common report of the country.”¹ It is indeed evident that the imagination of the people, exasperated by the rigour of the forest administration, had given birth to legends. Unlikely misdeeds were attributed, for instance, to the wicked King John : the jurors of Somerset affirmed that he had “afforested the whole of England.”² Was Edward, on the strength of traditions that were often doubtful, to surrender part of his heritage? Six centuries later, and filled with the philanthropic notions of to-day, we are apt to think that so great a king ought to have suppressed so evil a system, or at all events, to have loosened his grip and allowed the commissioners to confine the evil within narrow limits. But Edward kept in mind his coronation oath, the solemn pledge which he had given before God, that he would alienate neither the rights nor the property of the crown.

Such was his attitude of mind when on 26 September he summoned a parliament to meet at Lincoln on 20 January. In the writs of summons he stated that he needed the advice of his magnates and the commonalty of the realm, in order that he might take counsel on the reports of the commissions of disafforestation.³ His intention was to transfer all responsibility to those who demanded the acceptance of the findings of the inquisition. Without doubt he was actuated simultaneously by a conscientious scruple and a secret hope that he might lead his subjects to think twice before taking action. But the magnates, asked to declare that by confirming the perambulations the king would not injure the crown or violate his oath, refused to reply on this point, and demanded immediate disafforestments. All the records of Lincoln,

Parliament
Jan., 1301

1. Perambulation of 29 June, 1300 : “Iurati quesiti qualiter constat eis quod predictus dominus Iohannes rex afforestaverit omnia maneria, villas et hameletta predicta, dicunt quod ex relatu antecessorum suorum et per commune dictum patrie ” (Turner, p. 121).

2. “. . . quando afforestavit totam Angliam ” (Turner, p. cii, n.).

3. Parl. Writs, i, 89. See the detailed account in Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii, 156 sqq.

give the impression that the debate was very violent. Edward tried to indicate how seriously his dignity had been insulted by the "bill" of twelve articles which was addressed to him, and imprisoned the knight who had presented it: "those who brought us the bill from the Archbishop of Canterbury and from the others who unwarrantably importuned us at the Parliament of Lincoln," were the words he used in the writ ordering the imprisonment.¹ Nevertheless he gave way, confirmed the Charter of the Forest, together with Magna Carta,² and granted the request that he should issue letters patent ratifying the disafforestments suggested in the reports of the perambulations.³ But he had already shown that only force would make him yield.⁴

The king
compelled to yield

He waited till 1305 before freeing himself from engagements which in his eyes had no validity. He needed the support of the Holy See: and the election of the weak Clement V.⁵ favoured his designs.

In 1305 Edward issued an Ordinance of the Forest, in which he did indeed recognise the disafforestments that had been carried out. But he was evidently in no gracious temper. He confirmed persons "put outside the Forest" in the right of being free from all "the things which the

The Ordinance
of 1305

1. "Celi qui nous porta la bille de par l'ercevesqe de Cantebiris et de par les autres qui nous presserent outraiusement au parlement de Nichole." The document is quoted in Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii. 158, n. 1. Cf. Rishanger, ed. Riley (R.S.), p. 198: "Rex . . . parliamentum tenuit Stamfordiae [sic], ad quod convenerunt comites et barones, cum equis et armis, eo, prout dicebatur, proposito, ut executionem Chartae de Foresta hactenus dilatam extorquerent ad plenum. Rex autem, eorum instantiam et importunitatem attendens, eorum voluntati in omnibus condescendit." See also Flores Historiarum, ed. Luard (R.S.), iii. 303.

2. Letters-patent of 14 Feb., 1301 (Bémont, p. 109).

3. Turner, p. cv, n. 3; Blackstone, Magna Carta, p. lxxii.

4. In letters-patent of 14 Oct., 1301, nominating commissioners to make a perambulation in the forests of Devon, Edward again inserted a reservation of the rights of the crown (C.P.R., 1292-1301, p. 607).

5. Bertrand de Got, who became pope under this name, was archbishop of Bordeaux, and thus one of Edward's subjects. On his relations with Edward see W. W. Capes, The English Church in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries, pp. 38 sqq.

foresters demand of them," but denied to them, in their new state, the privilege "of having common within the bounds of the forests": finally he was resolved to keep all his demesne in "the state of free chase and of free warren," so that in practice the inhabitants of disafforested lands on the royal demesne gained next to nothing by the change.¹ At the same time he was pressing on his negotiations with Rome, and on 20 December the pope published the desired bull.

In the preamble, Clement V. recalled the conspiracy formed in 1297, during the king's absence, to force him to make certain unjust concessions regarding "the forests and other rights which concerned the crown and the honour of his authority." The king's enemies had stirred up the people and sown scandal: he had been obliged to yield, and on his return he had again been forced, "by importunity and presumptuous instance," to renew his concessions. Now these tended to the injury of the royal prerogative, and the king's promises were incompatible with his pledge, given at his coronation, that he would defend the honour and rights of the crown. The pope therefore revoked and annulled the concessions absolutely, and forbade the English clergy to do anything contrary to this revocation. He added, however, that the rights of the English people should remain exactly as they had been before the concessions in question were extorted from the king.²

A little later, in the Ordinance of the Forest of 27 May, 1306, the king on his part declared the disafforestments to be null and void: he had not granted them of his free will, and the sovereign pontiff had cancelled them.³ At the same time, he obtained from the pope the suspension of Archbishop Winchelsey.

Clement V's
bull, 20 Dec., 1305

Ordinance of the Forest,
May, 1306

1. Statutes, i, 144.

2. Bémont, pp. 110 sqq.

3. Statutes, i, 149.
162, n. 2.

The passage is quoted in Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii,

In the same Ordinance of 1306, the king admitted that the misdeeds of the foresters had not ceased. "By the reports of our subjects and the frequent complaints of those oppressed, whereby our mind is sensibly moved and troubled, we have learned that the people of the realm are miserably oppressed by the officers of our forests." He declared that correct legal procedure was not observed; accusations were presented, not by the "good men" of the country, but by one or two foresters or verderers, and the innocent were condemned. He ordered that the regular procedure should be followed, that the juries of presentment should not consist of officials, and that oppressive and corrupt foresters should be punished.¹

Edward I recognised the evil and promised mere palliatives. The opposition had demanded a potent remedy in vain. Their long struggle seemed to have ended in defeat.²

The extravagant, unsystematic, and oppressive rule of Edward II and his favourites was naturally by no means beneficial to the inhabitants of the Forest. Gaveston regarded it merely as a field for profitable speculations in the leasing of land.³ The question of the Forest was not raised again until the opposition took concerted action and imposed reforms on Edward. Then, as before, it was the barons who led the movement.⁴ In the famous

The existence of abuses admitted by Edward

The question of disafforestation
under Edward II

1. Statutes, i, 147 sqq. There was no real jury of presentment for forest offences. See above, p. 163.

2. It has sometimes been questioned whether the disafforestments were really annulled. There is, however, no doubt of it. At the Parliament of 1316 the lords and commons asserted that the perambulations of Edward I had not been put into effect: "Perambulationes ille non sunt hiis diebus observate." (Parl. Writs, ii, pt. 2, 159).

3. By letters-patent of 11 Dec., 1310, he was authorised to enclose and let certain estates in the Forest (C.P.R., 1307-13, p. 295).

4. There is nothing about the Forest in the eleven articles presented in 1309, which, as Stubbs says (Const. Hist., ii, 339), represent in particular the wishes of the commons (Rot. Parl. i, 443 sqq.). Nothing more can be inferred than that the commons did not venture to touch upon the question of the Forest.

The Ordinances of 1311 Ordinances of 1311, the twenty-one bishops, earls and barons who drew them up denounced the illegalities committed by the forest officials, and tried to put an end to them. The authorised procedure for the punishment of criminals was, they said, continually violated by "the wardens of the forests on this side Trent and beyond, and by other ministers"; the innocent were condemned, and the people dared not complain: all the officials of the Forest were, therefore, suspended from their functions, and all complaints against them might be brought before commissioners, "good and loyal men," who should be empowered to hear and determine them before the following Easter: and guilty officers should be permanently removed from their posts. As for the future, the officials were ordered to act in strict conformity with the rules laid down in the Charter of the Forest and in the Ordinance of 1306. Nothing was said about perambulations, but it was ordered that the charter should be observed "in all points."¹

The king's resistance Edward II, of course, refused for some years to give effect to the Ordinances, which had been won from him by force. The "two French jurists" commissioned to prove their illegality, went so far as to affirm that "they were in almost all points contrary to the Great Charter and the Charter of the Forest, to which no prejudice might be done, because this would be contrary to the oath taken by the king at his coronation."²

One of those who urged the king to resistance was Hugh le Despenser the elder, who had been justice of the Forest under Edward I, and who had obtained from the pope the bull of 1305.³ As a result of the parliament which sat from January to March, 1315, Hugh le

1. Statutes, i. 160-1; Rot. Parl., i. 282-3.

2. See the text of the Objections in the Annales Londinienses (Chronicles of Edward I and Edward II, ed. Stubbs, i. 212).

3. See above, p. 223; and Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii, 352, 355.

Dispenser had to resign his seat on the council,¹ and Edward II, yielding to a request of the commons, made proclamation in every county that he proposed to enforce the Charter of the Forest and the findings of the perambulations, and that he had appointed commissioners to this end.² The king probably forgot his pledges, for various people refused to pay the twentieth granted by parliament in return for the promised reforms, declaring that the king should have had the Charters and Ordinances executed, besides instituting new perambulations, and that he had done none of these things.³

Finally, at the parliament which was held in January, 1316, at Lincoln—a notable place in the history of the Forest—the opposition party among the nobles seized control of the government, and the work of disafforestation was resumed.

The
parliament
of 1316

It is proved by letters patent sent to the sheriffs on 20 February that the triumphant party had determined to put an end to the conflict, and to execute the promises of the Charter of 1217, though not to go beyond them. The prelates, earls, barons, and commons had declared that the perambulations of the time of Edward I had not been put into effect, and the king had agreed that they should be. Nevertheless, the royal council was to investigate the matter thoroughly.⁴ The foresters-in-fee were summoned to give evidence. All official documents likely to furnish clear information were to be produced.

Disafforestation entrusted to the Council

There was no intention of departing from the lines of policy laid down by Henry III and Edward I: neither

1. Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii, p. 355.

2. The writ was dated 20 April, 1315 (C.C.R., 1313-18, p. 224).

3. We know of this resistance to the tax from the royal protest of 8 June, 1315 (C.P.R., 1313-17, p. 324).

4. It will be remembered that parliament had just given extraordinary powers to the council and had appointed as president Thomas of Lancaster, the leader of the opposition.

the forests in the royal demesne, nor those which existed before the reign of Henry II, were to be disafforested; and, if necessary, the results of the perambulations under Edward I were to be revised according to this principle. The final word would rest with the council: and every county court was to elect two knights, who within the fortnight after Easter should appear before the council, empowered to consent, on behalf of the community of the shire, to whatever the council might ordain regarding the limits of the Forest.¹

There is strong reason to doubt whether the delimitation of the forests was carried out in the way indicated by this writ, and whether the aristocratic government of Thomas of Lancaster fulfilled promises which the crown had succeeded in evading for a century. The first article of the second statute of Edward III, which enjoins the execution and completion of the perambulations made under Edward I, would have been differently worded if the bounds of the Forest had been definitively fixed by Edward II.² It seems certain that the indolent Thomas of Lancaster lacked the consistency of purpose necessary to carry out the laborious inquisition initiated by the writ of 1316,³ that partial results were indeed attained,⁴ but that the monarchical reaction of 1322 brought the process of disafforestation to a stand. Letters close, addressed in 1323 to Aymer of Valence, Earl of Pembroke, Justice of the Forest south of the Trent, ordered him to restore to the Forest all the woods of the royal demesne which

Lack of substantial results

1. Parl. Writs, ii, pt. 2, pp. 158-9.

2. "Et qe la puralée qui estoit chivauché en temps le roi Edward, ael le roi q'or est, se tiegne en la forme q'ele estoit chivachée et bundée; e qe sur ceo soit chartre faite a chescun countée ou ele fust chivaché. Et par la ou ele ne feust my chivachée, le roi voet q'ele soit chivauché par bons et loialx e qe chartre sur ce soit faite come desus est dit" (Statutes, i. 255).

3. See the letters patent of 21 Nov., 1318, which show that the commissioners entrusted with the perambulation in Devonshire had done nothing (C.P.R., 1317-21, p. 240).

4. It was officially stated, in letters patent of 1341 that the Forest of Dean was reduced by a quarter under Edward II (C.P.R., 1340-43, pp. 190 sqq.).

had belonged to it at the date of the issue of the Charter, and which had been disafforested by the perambulations made during the reigns of Edward I and the present king.¹ We have here, it is true, the principle laid down in the writ of 1316, but effect was given only to the restrictions of this writ and not to its promise that all lands should be disafforested which ought to be. Edward was trying, in fact, by a revision of the concessions, to diminish their value.

It is not surprising that after dethroning Edward II Isabella and Mortimer should have sought to make themselves popular by a complete change of policy. In the statute of 1327, to which reference was made above, they say nothing of any work that may have been accomplished by the council of 1316, and pass over in silence Edward I's repudiation of his promises. They declare that the Charter of the Forest is to be kept in all points; that the perambulations made under Edward I are to hold good, and that others are to be set on foot in counties where none have as yet been made; so that every county containing a forest is to have a charter declaring its limits.² Three years later, on 12 July, 1330, Edward III warned the Justice of the Forest south of the Trent not to allow regards and verderers to charge with offences against the vert and the venison those who dwell in districts disafforested by the perambulations under Edward I and Edward II: these perambulations were to be strictly observed.³

1. The document is dated 18 March, 1323 (C.C.R., 1318-1323, p. 634).
 2. Statutes, i. 255, art. i, quoted above; cf. the letters patent of 13 March, 1327 (C.P.R., 1327-30, p. 39) and the letters close of 10 May, 1327 (C.C.R., 1327-30, p. 124). The inhabitants of Surrey demanded a perambulation: their request was granted, and on 26 Dec., 1327, Edward III entirely disafforested the county; afterwards, on 4 Aug., 1333, he went back on this concession and declared that there had been a mistake. His good faith cannot be questioned, since in 1300 the jurors had declared that the afforestments in this county were made before the reign of Henry II (Select Pleas, pp. 117-8; Introd., p. cvi).
 3. C.C.R., 1330-33, p. 147.

We think, therefore, that if a precise date is to be assigned to the end of the long struggle for disafforestation, it is not the reign of Edward II, but the beginning of the reign of Edward¹ III that must be chosen. In later times, notably in 1347 and during the first years of the reign of Richard II, the commons are found complaining because the royal officers "of their malice have afforested, and strive from day to day to afforest, what had been disafforested," and the king replies that he wishes the Charter to be respected.¹ Officially, as the records of these incidents prove, the dispute was settled.

1. Rot. Parl., ii, 169b, 388a; iii, 18a; cf. ii, 311b, 335a, 367b; iii, 62a, 116a. In 1376 the king even replied that he would order a "chivachiée," that is to say, a perambulation to fix the disputed boundaries.

SOME REMARKS ON THE ORIGIN OF THE PURLIEU.

Whatever date historians choose to mark the actual accomplishment of the disafforestments, they are generally agreed that from this time begins the institution of the purlieu—that is to say, the disafforested districts were subjected to a special code of law for the protection of the beasts of the Forest. The inhabitants of these districts might hunt only on certain conditions, and they were under the oversight of special officers called “rangers” (rangiatores, rengiarii).¹

On this subject I wish to limit myself to two remarks : (1) The institution of the purlieu was not established at the time of the great disafforesting perambulations;² and (2) the laws of the purlieu were not, for the most part, peculiar to the disafforested districts of England.

The fourth and sixteenth articles of the Assize of Woodstock prove clearly that in the time of Henry II there already existed a sphere in which the king’s venison had its “peace,” but which was outside the Forest properly so called, where the vert also was protected by special laws and under the surveillance of the regards. This sphere was under the oversight of foresters; and if the land did not form part of the royal demesne, the owner had to appoint a forester pledged by oath to protect the king's beasts.¹ Article 16 prescribes a severe punishment—a year's imprisonment and fine at the king's mercy—for those who hunt by night, not only in the Forest, but also in those regions outside the Forest where the king's venison has its peace. The same penalty was imposed on whosoever should make “a forstallatio, living or dead, for the king's beasts, between his Forest and the woods or other places disafforested by him or his ancestors.”² That is to say, it was unlawful to use obstacles or beaters on the borders of disafforested land to prevent game from taking refuge in what was left of the Forest.

1. See Manwood, Treatise of the Lawes of the Forrest, chap. 20.

2. We are speaking of the institution, the laws of the purlieu, not of the word itself, for this (under the forms poralée, pouralé, puralé) appears in the rolls of parliament as early as the fourteenth century. From this time Poralée, the French word for perambulatio—an inquisition for the delimitation of the Forest—acquired also the meaning of a disafforested region.

In the time of Henry II, then, there were (1) lands outside, but of course near the Forest, where the king's beasts had their “peace” and where poaching by night was as severely punished as when it was practised in the Forest; (2) disafforested lands, adjoining the Forest, where it was permissible to hunt by day, but where it was contrary to law to hinder beasts that were making for the shelter of the Forest.

Nothing more is known. We cannot say whether the first class of protected lands was the outcome of disafforestation, or whether it had been instituted round certain forests to prevent the destruction of game that wandered beyond their limits. In any case, however, it is evident that the twelfth century kings strove to maintain control over lands adjoining the Forest; and that two of the rules afterwards imposed on the inhabitants of the purlieu—those against hunting at night and

1. “Et illi qui extra metas reguardi boscos habeant in quibus venatio domini regis pacem habet, nullum forestarium habeant, nisi assisam domini regis iuraverint et pacem venationis suae, et custodem aliquem ad boscum eius custodiendum” (Sel. Charters, p. 187, art. 4).

2. “Item rex praecipit quod nullus de cetero chaceat ullo modo ad capiendas feras per noctem infra forestam neque extra, ubicunque ferae suae frequentant vel pacem habent aut habere consueverunt, sub poena imprisonmentis unius anni et faciendo finem et redemptionem ad voluntatem suam, et quod nullus sub eadem poena faciat aliquam forstallationem feris suis vivam vel mortuam inter forestam suam et boscos vel alia loca per ipsum vel progenitores suos deafforestatos” (Art. 16: Sel. Charters, p. 188).

The right of the chase in lands disafforested during the 13th century hindering the game from entering the Forest—were already in existence under Henry II.¹ It might be thought that the kings of the thirteenth century, who carried out or promised much disafforestation, would have quickly completed the system which had already been outlined. This, however, was not the case. It seems that two opinions were held, one assigning the right of free chase to the inhabitants of disafforested regions, the other giving to the king the power of disposing as he would of all game found in them: and the kings halted between them. John seems to have acted on no fixed principle. In his charters of disafforestation he sometimes stipulated that the inhabitants of the disafforested country might hunt every kind of game on it, sometimes he said nothing on the point.² Henry III made warrens on disafforested land for the benefit of his favourites, and in 1258 the barons protested, asserting the principle that the chase was free in disafforested country.³ Even Edward I, with his zeal for making laws, established no rules for the purlieu, doubtless because he always had the secret intention of taking back the disafforested lands. In his ordinance of

Edward I did not establish the purlieu

1305 he confirmed the principle that persons "put outside the Forest" ought to be free from all "the things which the foresters demand of them," and in regard to the venison, he merely specified that he intended to reserve for himself all the hunting in lands which were part of the royal demesne.⁴

1. On these rules see Manwood, loc. cit., and Fisher, Forest of Essex, p. 167.

2. See the authorities cited above, p. 155, n. 5.

3. See the petition of the barons at the parliament of Oxford, art. 9: "Item petunt remedium quod forestae deafforestatae (sic) per cartam regis et per fidem eidem per communitatem totius regni factam, ita quod quisque ubique possit libere fugare, dominus rex de voluntate sua pluribus dedit de predicta libertate warennas, quae sunt ad nocumentum praedictae libertatis concessae" (Sel. Charters, p. 374).

4. Statutes, i, 144.

The measures taken by Edward II's council, when they wished to carry out the disafforestments, seem equally to prove that at this time there was no intention of establishing in the disafforested districts any extraordinary jurisdiction to protect the king's venison. The ancient Assize of Woodstock, which they need only have applied to the new situation, was apparently forgotten. Only one method of ensuring the peace of the game seems to have been thought of—namely, to get it back into the Forest. By two writs of 5 August 1316, the king ordered the Justice of the Forest south of the Trent to drive the game of the disafforested regions into the Forest within forty days, and reserved to himself, during this time, the right of hunting in the aforesaid districts.¹ It was no doubt hoped that when once restored to the Forest the game might be kept there, and it was perhaps now that with this end in view the authorities began to appoint, in certain forests, a special class of foresters called rangiatores.² Naturally, however, it was impossible to prevent the game from straying, and the forest officials soon took to prosecuting those who hunted beasts that had wandered into the purlieu. In 1372, 1376 and 1377 parliament protested, and demanded "that every man might hunt in the purlieu without hindrance." The king each time replied that the Charter of the Forest should be observed, an answer which meant nothing, since the charter made

Measures of 1316
to keep the game in the Forest

Possible origin of the rangers

1. C.P.R., 1313-17, p. 532; cf. the letters of Edward III (26 Dec., 1327) cited by Manwood (chap. 20).

2. In the seventeenth century the ranger undertook in his oath to drive back to the Forest all beasts which left it for the purlieu (Book of Oaths, 1649, cited by Fisher, Forest of Essex, p. 166). Mr. Turner quotes a document of the twelfth year of Edward III where mention is made of a person "nuper rengiarius" of the Forest of Braden (Select Pleas, p. xxv, n. 3). He states, however, that he has rarely found references to rangers in the fourteenth century. Mr. Fisher has discovered none in Essex before 1489. Manwood (chap. 20, § 13) gives no precise information about the institution of these officers.

no provision for such cases.¹ All these incidents show that the kings of the fourteenth century were anxious to secure their venison from any harm with which the disafforestments might threaten it, but they also show that no fixed rules and no administrative system had as yet been set up for the purlieu.

Gradually fixed rules arose: but they were neither peculiar to the purlieu nor new. As we have seen, the laws against hunting by night and forstallatio are already to be found in the Assize of Woodstock. In order to enjoy the right of the chase, the inhabitants of the purlieu had to possess no other qualifications than those demanded by the Ordinance of Richard II from every sportsman in the country.² Moreover, the restrictions placed on their hunting were no more severe than those which had to be observed in France by the lords of lands adjacent to royal forests: they were even less so. In France, no one might hunt deer or other large game within a tract two leagues³ broad around the royal forests,⁴ and in some districts the woods in this zone might not be sold except by permission of the king.⁵

In a word, then, the institution of the purlieu was established in England at the very end of the Middle Ages, but the germs of it already existed before the

1. Rot. Parl., ii, 313, 368; iii, 18.

2. See below, pp. 247 sqq.

3. Cf. the distancia duarum leucarum in the passage cited above, p. 190, n. 3.

4. See in the Ordonnances, v, 210 sqq., a very interesting dispute concerning the hunting-rights of the bishop of Albi, whose sport had been interfered with by the king's officers in forests "a Forestis regis per duas leucas vel circa distancium." In 1368 the Master of Waters and Forests for the sénéchausée of Toulouse confirmed the hunting-rights of the bishop in these forests, and authorised him, for special reasons, to hunt in a forest which he possessed within a distance of two leagues from the royal Forest. Cf. the great "Ordonnance des Eaux et Forêts" issued by Louis XIV in 1669, titre xxx, art. 14.

5. In 1232 the bailli of the Gâtinais held an inquisition to discover whether "boscus Brissi, qui distat a foresta domini regis per unam leucam vel circiter, qui est domini Brixiacensis . . . potest vendi sine licentia domini regis." (The document is published by L. Delisle: Historiens de France, xxiv, pt. i, p. 298*, no. 98).

thirteenth century, and the kings of France, on their side, had instituted a sort of purlieu around their forests.

Theory of the French origin of the purlieu It seems possible that the English purlieu and the analogous institution in France had a common origin in a Norman custom.

According to a petition addressed to Louis IX. by Henri d'Avaugour, Philip Augustus had confiscated a haie,¹ situated in the bailliage of Verneuil, because in this haie the huntsmen of the Lord of Laigle had hunted game which had come from the royal forest of Evreux, even following it into the forest. The confiscation had been made on the report of the king's huntsman, Roger de Bémécourt, a Norman knight.² Philip Augustus no doubt had precedents for his action: and it is not unreasonable to suppose that the powerful dukes of Normandy had created round their forests a protected zone, and that the rules on this subject in the Assize of Woodstock date from a time before the Conquest. Perhaps, indeed, they were known as far back as the Carolingian period.³

1. A haie was an enclosed hunting-preserve [corresponding, therefore, to the English "park"] It appears that this particular haie was not entirely enclosed.

2. Querimonia Henrici de Avaugor (A.D. 1247), in Historiens de France, xxiv, pt. ii, p. 730.

3. See the charter of 26 March, 800, by which Charles the Great allows the abbot and monks of St. Bertin to send their men to hunt in the abbey woods, "in eorum proprias silvas," in order to provide the house with skins and leather, on condition, however, that the forests of the king be respected: "salvas forestes nostras, quas ad opus nostrum constitutas habemus" (Monum. Germ., Diplom. Karolin., vol. i, p. 256, no. 191). It was perhaps because their woods were near a royal forest that the monks of St. Bertin needed this special permission.

THE DECLINE OF THE FOREST. CONTRARY DEVELOPMENT IN FRANCE.

We cannot undertake to pursue further the history of the English Forest,¹ and shall be content with explaining, in a few words, why it ceases henceforth to be connected with the history of the constitution. There are no printed judicial records to serve as authorities for this concluding chapter. The rolls of parliament, the collections of writs and statutes, the numerous and valuable calendars of the patent and close rolls, cannot supply those characteristic and vivid details which are essential to a picture of the actual effects of legislation and of the working of the administrative system. They enable us, however, to form consistent and fairly definite conclusions of a general nature.

It will not be until all the extant "perambulations" of the reigns of the three Edwards have been published, that historians will be able to determine, even approximately, within what limits the forest law was subsequently administered. In the present lack of printed evidence, we can only say that the forest law remained in force throughout the fourteenth century—not infrequently with the distortions and abuses that had disgraced it during the previous two hundred years—though in some respects its severity was diminished.

State records prove that the administrative machinery remained almost exactly as before. The chapters of the

1. Elaborate researches among original records would be necessary for the accomplishment of this task. Many unpublished documents concerning the Forest in the 14th and 15th centuries are no doubt in existence. It is remarkable, however, that Mr. Fisher was unable to find any forest pleas for Essex between 1324 and 1489 (Forest of Essex, p. 89).

Maintenance of the administrative and judicial machinery regard were in essentials identical with those of the thirteenth century.¹ We have numerous writs concerning the judicial eyres, and the handing over of offenders to their twelve "mainpernors," who must undertake to produce them on the appointed day before the itinerant justices.²

The king's writs make continual reference to the Assize of the Forest, along with the Charter of 1217, and all offences against the assize were punished. Royal justice did not spare even the archbishop of York.³

Continuance of abuses Up to the end of the century there were loud complaints against the foresters. At a time when the government was short of money and oppressive, it was natural that the foresters should have the same evil reputation as the sheriffs and escheators. Printed records being rare, we have few details as to their exactions. Some echoes

Complaints in Parliament of popular grievances reach us through the petitions of the commons in parliament.⁴

The people did not venture to complain of the forest system itself, and they showed unusual boldness when in 1372 they pointed out that the game destroyed crops and pastures and forced the peasants to abandon certain villages.⁵ They likewise feared that complaints against the officials would prove useless or injurious to themselves.⁶ There was probably much

1. See in the Calendars of Close Rolls the writs ordering the holding of the regards before the arrival of the justices; e.g., C.C.R., 1307-1313, pp. 174-5, where the capitula are all quoted. 2. C.C.R., passim.

3. A park held by the archbishop in Sherwood Forest was confiscated by reason of an offence against the Assize of the Forest. On 14 Feb., 1355, the king pardoned him, and ordered Ralph de Neville, justice of the Forest south of the Trent, to restore the park. Ralph de Neville ignored the command, and on 20 Nov., 1356, the king had to repeat it, mentioning that the archbishop [Thoresby] was his chancellor (C.C.R., 1354-60, pp. 113, 288).

4. Protests from important men are rare; the complaint of the bishop of Salisbury, who at the parliament of 1325 asserted that his "free chase" had been confiscated, is an exceptional case (Rot. Parl., i, 440b).

5. Ibid., ii, 313a. 6. Ibid., iii, 18a (A.D. 1377).

oppression. The officers of the Forest punished people for offences committed outside the limits fixed by the perambulations.¹ The innocent were unjustly condemned, without regular inquisition, and by means of false witnesses.² William de Claydon, Justice of the Forest in the days of Edward II, threw people into prison and otherwise maltreated them, sometimes forcing them to accuse "certain who were in no wise guilty."³ Other officers, to secure a conviction, would bring forward strangers who knew nothing of the matter.⁴ Notwithstanding the Charter, inhabitants of the Forest were summoned to the swanimotes, and fined if they failed to appear.⁵ The foresters demanded contributions to which they had no claim.⁶ Sometimes the chancery refused to issue writs against officers who were violating the Charter of the Forest.⁷

Edward III and Richard II repeatedly showed a desire to protect their subjects against such abuses.

Intervention by the kings They ordered inquisitions,⁸ and issued minute reminders of the correct procedure for the punishment of forest offenders.⁹

In the statute which provided safeguards against purveyors, Edward III also ordered the foresters to content themselves with the levies "due according to ancient

1. Rot. Parl., ii, 311b, 335a, 367b; iii, 62a, 116a (A.D. 1376, 1377, 1379, 1381).

2. "Pur ceo qe plusours gentz sount desheritez, reintz et destruz par les soverains gardeins de forestes de cea Trente et de la, et par les autres ministres, encountre la fourme de la chartre de la Foreste . . ." (First statute of Edw. III, art. 8: Statutes, i, 254). Cf. Rot. Parl., iii, 164b (A.D. 1383).

3. Rot. Parl., ii, 10a; cf. p. 380b.

4. Ibid., ii, 169b (A.D. 1347).

5. Ibid., iii, 18a (A.D. 1377).

6. Ibid., ii, 24 (A.D. 1328) and 239b (A.D. 1351-2).

7. Ibid., ii, 203b. The records of the inquisitions (P.R.O., Forest Proceedings, Treasury of Receipts) would no doubt furnish many instances of the crimes and exactions of the foresters. See the inquisition of 1369 published in Turner, p. xlix.

8. C.C.R., 1343-6, p. 257.

9. In 1327 Edward III set forth in detail all the rules of procedure (Statutes, i, 254, art. 8). In 1383 Richard II forbade forest officials to put any pressure on juries to make them accuse the innocent, to imprison anyone "without due indictment," or to impose fines contrary to the Assize of the Forest. (Ibid., ii, 32.) As was pointed out above (p. 163) there was no jury for forest offences in the 13th century.

law.”¹ Like their brethren in France, the kings of England saw clearly that it was their interest to defend their subjects against the exactions of officials, even when these sprang from an excess of zeal in the service of the crown. In the fourteenth century, as before, they knew quite well that they had many unscrupulous foresters who pocketed arbitrary amercements and sold wood without accounting for it.²

But it was hard for a fourteenth century ruler to secure the obedience of his officers, and to check or even to discover their extortions. Matters were still

Inadequate repression of abuses

worse when the throne was occupied by an incapable king like Edward II, or by an extravagant and pleasure-loving warrior like Edward III: as for Richard II, it is scarcely necessary to mention that he succeeded to the crown as a child, at a time when the authority of the government was weak and discredited. It is, therefore, very probable that the suppression of abuses committed by the foresters was of a mild and ineffectual nature.

In the fourteenth century, nevertheless, the Forest was no longer one of the chief grievances of the nation. It is no longer a national grievance

The Forest

remarkable that, with the exception of Essex, the counties most profoundly affected by the revolt of 1381 were precisely those where no forest existed: and in Essex itself, the forest law seems to have had as little to do with the rising as elsewhere. The peasants demanded the abolition of hunting privileges, but not the abolition of prosecutions for assart, purpresture, and waste, though these were an essential feature of the forest code in England. Their attitude is very significant.

1. Statutes, i, 321, ch. 7 (25 Edw. III); Thomson, Magna Carta, p. 356.

2. It is significant that in an act of amnesty, of which we shall speak below, Edward III expressly excludes from the operation of its benefits the justices; head wardens; wardens of forests, parks, and chases; foresters; verderers; regards; agisters; deputy-wardens; under-foresters; and sellers of wood. (Statutes, i, 392, ch. 4).

In the present state of knowledge, it is difficult to say with certainty to what extent the position of the inhabitants of the Forest had improved. It is clear, however, that the severity of the forest law had been considerably relaxed. In all replies to petitions concerning the Forest, the king repeats that he means to follow the Charter of 1217. The trees were no longer regarded as sacred : at his accession Edward III gave permission to land-owners to take from their woods within the Forest whatever they needed for their houses or fences.¹ The well-being of the population was set above the preservation of cover for the game : and this alone was a revolutionary change. Moreover, a very welcome alteration was gradually made in the method of conducting inquisitions. In the thirteenth century, when a trespass against the venison was discovered, the inquisition, as we have seen, had to be conducted by the four nearest townships, and they were collectively amerced if they failed to supply satisfactory information. By the end of the reign of Henry III this oppressive system was beginning to fall into disuse, and its place was taken by general inquisitions, which were concerned with all offences, against both the venison and the vert, recently committed in the Forest. The Ordinance of 1306 established them on a firm footing, and in the fourteenth century they occurred very frequently, sometimes even twice in one year.² Mr. Turner has published, as an example, the record of a general inquisition of 1369 "on the state of the Forest of Rutland." It was conducted by the deputy-justice of the Forest south of the Trent : and the deputy-warden of the Forest of Rutland, six foresters, two verderers, twelve regarders, twelve freeholders of the Forest, and twelve freeholders from outside, appeared as jurors.¹ The authorities, then, had abandoned the special inquisition on injuries done to the game, which was in reality a means of raising money. Furthermore, trespasses against the vert and venison were leniently treated by the king : a statute of the forty-third year of Edward III granted indemnity to all private individuals who were guilty of such offences.²

1. "Item qe chescun homme qi eit boys deinz forest, poet prendre en son boys demeigne housbote et heybote sanz estre attaché par ministres de la foreste, issint q'ils le face [sic] par veue de forester." (Statutes, i, 255, chap. 2). Compare the corresponding article of the Consuetudines et Assise de Foresta, published forty or fifty years before : "Liberacio housbote et haibote fiat prout boscus pati potest in statu quo est, et non ad exigenciam petentis" (ibid., p. 243).

2. See the tables drawn up by Mr. Turner, p. xlvii. It should be noted that the regards, which dealt with other offences than the destruction of game, continued to be held, as is proved by the close rolls of Edward II and Edward III.

In the fifteenth century, thanks at first to the policy of the Lancastrian kings,³ and afterwards to the anarchy which almost suspended the operation of the forest law, the forest system became weaker and weaker. The rolls of parliament no longer contain complaints against the Forest. According to English legal authorities, however, it was during the second half of the sixteenth century that the decline of the system became most rapid. The pleasure of the chase, declared the attorney-general of Charles I in 1628, "being not so much esteemed by the late King Edward the Sixth (by reason of his minoritie), and by the two succeeding Queenes (by reason of their sexe), the lesse care of the due execucion of the forest laws consequentlie ensued, and the keeping of the Courts of Swainmote and Justice Seate became almost totallie neglected

Decay of the forest system

1. Turner, p. xlix.

2. Statutes, i, 392. It is, however, stated that the commons had demanded this amnesty, and that the king was rewarding them for the assistance they had so often given him.

3. Pierre de Fenin's Chronicle (ed. Mlle. Dupont, Soc. d'Hist. de France, 1837, p. 187) contains a curious passage concerning the pity felt by Henry V—in France, at any rate—for the people who were oppressed by the owners of warrens : "Le povre peuple l'amoit sur tous autres ; car il estoit tout conclu de preserver le menu peuple contre les gentis hommes des grans intortions qu'ilz faisoient en France et en Picardie et par tout le royaume : et par especial n'eust plus souffert qu'ilz eussent gouverné leurs chevaux, chiens, et oyseaulx sur le clergié ne sur le menu peuple, comme ils avoient a coustume de faire ; qui estoit chose assés raisonnable au roy Henry de ce vouloir faire, et dont il avoit et eust eu la grace et priaire du clergié et povre peuple."

and disused.¹ A large amount of forest land was at this time enclosed without authority.² When, under Elizabeth, John Manwood took up his pen to write the "Treatise and Discourse of the Lawes of the Forrest," it was in the hope of reviving laws of which "verie little or nothing" remained.³ James I and Charles I tried to recall them to life, and the famous Justice Finch even demanded that the perambulations of Edward I should be revoked.⁴ But the Great Rebellion prevented the realisation of such worthy ambitions.⁵

The restraints which in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries had pressed so heavily on so many English peasants had, in short, largely disappeared at the end of the Middle Ages. It was no longer a crime for a landholder to cut down a branch or clear a piece of the Forest which belonged to him. But it must not be inferred that everyone was free to take the game: and a sketch of the development of the English game-laws will perhaps not be without interest.

During the fourteenth century the venison was still eagerly coveted. Whenever circumstances were favourable, organised poaching on a grand scale became prevalent, and the foresters themselves were not the least guilty. When the lands of Thomas of Lancaster were seized by Edward II, the great forest of

Lamentations of Manwood

Lenient treatment of trespasses
against the vert

Origin of the game-laws.
The right of the chase eagerly coveted

1. Cited by Fisher, op. cit., pp. 294-5.

2. Ibid., pp. 323 sqq.

3. "... Seeing that so many do daily so contemptuously commit such heynous spoiles and trespasses therein, that the greatest part of them are spoiled and decayed, and also that verie little, or nothing, as yet is extant concerning the lawes of the Forrest..." (Ed. 1598, dedication to Lord Howard, Justice of the Forests).

4. S. R. Gardiner, Hist. of England, 1603-1642, vii, 362 sqq. Cf. J. Nisbet, Hist. of the Forest of Dean, Eng. Hist. Rev., 1906, p. 449.

5. Interesting details concerning the Forest in modern times will be found in Mr. Fisher's book. See also J. Nisbet and G. W. Lascelles, Forestry and the New Forest, in the Victoria County History of Hampshire, ii, 428 sqq.

Pickering¹ was the scene of hunts arranged by the inhabitants and the foresters.² At the beginning of the Hundred Years' War Edward III had scarcely sailed for France when a general attack was made on the game in the forests, parks, and chases belonging to the crown.³

At the end of the Middle Ages, however, the question of hunting-rights had changed its character. The two parties to the controversy were no longer the king and the baronage. On the one side were the king, the barons, and the wealthy landowners who owned warrens; on the other, the peasants, artisans, and lower clergy. These classes wished for permission to hunt and fish on Sundays, partly for the sport, partly to supplement their incomes. It infuriated them to see the multiplication of warrens swarming with game, to the damage of the crops and the exclusive advantage of the rich and their servants. The whole of the royal demesne was treated as warren. In disafforested districts, many estates where game was plentiful had been made warrens for the benefit of one or two people. The regions where all might hunt doubtless consisted of little save fields and moors where neither fur nor feather was to be found. The rebels of 1381 insisted that hunting and fishing should be made entirely free. Assembled at Smithfield, they demanded from the king by their spokesman, Wat Tyler, "that all warrens, as well in fisheries as in parks and woods, should be common to all; so that throughout the realm, in the waters, ponds, fisheries, woods, and forests, poor as well as rich might take the venison and hunt the hare

Demand for the abolition of game-preserves

Claims of Wat Tyler

1. The Forest of Pickering in Yorkshire, and the forests of Lancashire, were held by the earls of Lancaster, who, by an exceptional privilege, enforced all the forest laws for their own advantage (Turner, p. ix).

2. Letters close of 22 Aug., 1323 (C.C.R., 1323-7, pp. 15-16).

3. Letters close of 26 July, 1339 (C.C.R., 1339-41, p. 258). See the inquisitions published by Greswell, op. cit. pp. 104-9. The clergy were still conspicuous among the poachers. Cf. what Chaucer says of the sporting monk in the prologue of the Canterbury Tales.

in the fields." Richard hesitated, and if we are to believe the continuator of Knighton,¹ it was then that Tyler seized the bridle of his horse and was slain by the king's followers.

During the disturbed years which followed the rising, the lower classes acted on the principle for which their leader had suffered. In a petition of the parliament of 1390 it was stated that "artificers and labourers, that is to say, butchers, sewers, tailors, and other varlets, keep greyhounds and other dogs, and on festivals, at times when good Christians are in church hearing divine service, they go hunting in the parks, rabbit-preserves, and warrens of lords and others, and ruin them utterly." The commons proceeded to declare that "under colour of such chases," these wicked people encourage one another in the deplorable spirit of revolt, the effects of which have been seen, holding "at these times their meetings for debate, covenin, and conspiracy, in order to stir up riot and sedition against your Majesty and the laws." To prevent a social upheaval, it was obviously necessary to bestow special hunting-rights on landed proprietors and the rich: "May it please the king to ordain in this present parliament, that no kind of artificer, labourer, or any other who does not possess lands or tenements to the value of forty shillings a year, or any priest or clerk, if he has not a preferment worth ten pounds, shall keep any greyhound or other dog, unless he be bound or led, hobbled or lawed, on pain of imprisonment for a year; and that every justice of the peace shall have power of enquiry and to punish all offenders."² "Le roi le veut," was the answer; and a statute was issued forbidding, on pain of a year's imprisonment, every

The Parliament of 1390 opposed to popular demands

The Statute of Richard II

1. Knighton, Chronicle, ed. Lumby (R.S.), ii. 137. Cf. the letters-patent of 12 May, 1381 (C.P.R., 1377-81, p. 634).

2. Rot. Parl., iii, 273, cap. 58.

layman who did not possess landed property worth forty shillings a year, and every clerk with an annual income of less than ten pounds, to keep hunting-dogs or to use ferrets or any snares whatsoever to catch deer, hares, rabbits, or any other game. This, said the statute, was "the sport of the gentle."¹

The crown, then, resisted the encroachments of the people by establishing special privileges in favour of certain classes of society. Exactly the same course was adopted in France. Seven years later, the statute of Richard II was followed by an ordinance of Charles VI conceived in the same spirit.² The same motives were alleged on both sides. The artisan must stick to his craft and the peasant to his plough, or else order would vanish.³ The only difference was that in France the privilege of the chase was limited to the nobility, whereas in England it was conferred on all who held a moderate amount of landed property. The game-laws, as is usually the case, were symbolical of the state of society.⁴

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the struggle between the privileged and the poachers continued. In 1417, when Henry V was engaged in the conquest of Normandy, parliament complained that armed bands were laying waste the chases of the lords, beating and wounding the keepers.⁵ During the Wars of the Roses, disguised and masked brigands stole the

The struggle for the right of the chase in the 15th and 16th centuries

1. Statutes ii, 65, cap. 13.

2. Ordinance of 10 Jan., 1397 (Recueil des Ordonnances, viii, 117 sqq.) : " . . . Lesdits non nobles, en faisant ce que dit est, delaissent a faire leurs labourages ou marchandises, et commettent plusieurs larrécins de grosses bestes et de connins, etc. . . ." Falling into idleness, they "deviennent larrons, murtriers, espieurs de chemins."

3. This theory was put forward again, in the 17th and 18th centuries, by French and English legal writers. Cf. Blackstone, Commentaries, bk. ii, c. 27; and Pothier, Traité du droit de domaine et de propriété, pt. I, ch. ii, art. 28.

4. In Germany also, at the end of the Middle Ages, the nobles claimed that they alone had the right to hunt. See A. Schwappach, Grundriss der Forst-und Jagdgeschichte Deutschlands, p. 52.

5. Rot. Parl., iv, 113-4.

deer and committed murders in the forests and game-preserves.¹ In the sixteenth century Henry VIII ordained savage punishments for poachers; and for some years the death-penalty appears again in the forest law.² It was a time when hunting-parties on a magnificent scale were arranged by the king and nobility.

As the rural aristocracy grew in power, they gradually threw off all restrictions on their right to hunt on their own estates. When, in the eighteenth century, Blackstone wrote his Commentaries on English Law, he conscientiously stated the theory that the king, by virtue of his prerogative, had exclusive hunting-rights over his whole realm, no subject having the right to hunt without the express permission of the king: but he himself confesses that "this exclusive prerogative of the king is little known or considered."³ As a matter of fact, the right of the chase was exercised by every landowner on his manor.

In France, at the same period, the theory of the royal prerogative had triumphed. There the history of the English Forest had been exactly inverted.

Inverse process in France In France, during the collapse of the Carolingian Empire, the royal Forest, like other prerogatives of the crown, had been dismembered and seized by the nobles, and up to the thirteenth century, the king enjoyed no peculiar privileges in regard to the chase. He acquired one by constituting himself the protector of the weak, not only

Growth of the royal prerogative in France against his own officials, but also against the owners of warrens. After the accession of St. Louis, the Parlement was rigidly opposed to any extension of the warrens, which were ruining agriculture, and suppressed even royal warrens if they were of recent date. In the course of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the

1. Statute of i Henry VII (Statutes, ii, 505).

2. Statute of 1539, art. 5 (Statutes, iii, 731).

3. Commentaries, ii, c. 27.

principle was established that a warren was legal only if it was very ancient, and that the king alone might authorise the creation of new ones. Moreover, the extensive rights which the monarchy now claimed in this sphere, were used not only to protect agriculture against the mania of the nobles for sport, but also, as we have seen, to take away the hunting-rights of the common people.

Towards the end of the fourteenth century, at the time when Richard II and Charles VI published their ordinances restricting the chase to the nobility, the growing rights of the king of France and the declining rights of the king of England met, so to speak, and stood side by side at the same height. In the fifteenth century, the monarchy became considerably weaker in England, while Charles VII and Louis XI revived and strengthened it in France. In questions of the chase, Louis XI maintained his prerogative with particular severity. With him, hunting definitively became a royal sport, and no one might hunt save by royal favour. In France after his reign, and in England after the accession of the Tudors, the two opposite movements did not continue regularly. In England Henry VIII was a despot and a keen sportsman, and James I and Charles I tried to restore the Forest to its former state: while in France the anarchy of the sixteenth century afforded an opening to the pretensions of the nobles. Eventually, however, the two processes ended as might have been anticipated from the political experiences of the two nations. While in England the landed aristocracy acquired the right of the chase, in France the king seized it to his exclusive advantage. He allowed the nobles to hunt: but merely for his own pleasure, and

The "capitaineries" at the cost of untold sufferings on the part of the peasantry, he established vast "capi-

The situation at the end of the 14th century

Louis XI

Effect of political changes

taineries" which in many respects recall the English Forest of the Middle Ages. On the eve of the French Revolution, the damage done to cultivation by the king's game and huntsmen was one of the causes of the exasperation of the peasantry, and it is from the English traveller Young that we have the most vigorous description of the distress and indignation caused by the king's hunting-rights. It might almost be said that the institution of the Forest, born among the Franks and transported to England, had afterwards returned from England to France. In both countries it was one of the most odious fruits of arbitrary power.

Exasperation of the French peasantry

CAUSES AND GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE RISING OF 1381.

STUBBS' account of the rising of 1381 has been more completely superseded than any other part of his second volume. An entirely new light has been thrown on the history of the rebellion and its causes by researches in English records, particularly the judicial and financial collections of the Record Office. The pioneer in this work was a Frenchman, André Réville. This young scholar, who died in 1894 at the age of twenty-seven, presented, in 1890, to the examiners of l'Ecole des Chartes a dissertation on the rebellion in Hertfordshire, Suffolk, and Norfolk. To the end of his life he continued his elaborate researches in preparation of the general work in which he hoped to describe the causes and the various aspects of the movement. Two years after the death of Réville, Mr. Edgar Powell published a little book on the rebellion in Cambridgeshire, Suffolk, and Norfolk,¹ and in 1897 an American student of the University of Ieipsic, Mr. T. W. Page, wrote an essay on the commutation of the labour services, and refuted the theory of Rogers concerning the causes of the rising of 1381.² Réville's manuscripts were entrusted to me, and on them I based a volume which appeared in 1898, and which still remains the most valuable source of information on the rising as a whole.³ But I cannot be satisfied with merely

1. The Rising in East Anglia in 1381, with an Appendix containing the Suffolk Poll Tax Lists for that year.

2. Die Umwandlung der Frohndienste in Geldrenten in den æstlichen, mittleren und südlichen Graftschaften Englands (1897). I did not know of Mr. Page's essay in time to make use of it in my work of 1898. [Mr. Page subsequently published an English edition of his study: The End of Villainage in England (New York, 1900). Cf. Eng. Hist. Rev., xv, 774.]

3. Le Soulèvement des Travailleurs d'Angleterre en 1381, by Andre Réville. Studies and Documents published with a preface and an historical introduction by Ch. Petit-Dutaillis.

referring my readers to this work. In the first place, the book is out of print, and moreover in the last fifteen years fresh documents have been discovered, and certain parts of the subject investigated more thoroughly.

A chronicle of intense interest, which was used by the Elizabethan historian, Stow,¹ and which I had known only through the somewhat unsatisfactory medium of this writer, has been found at the British Museum and edited by Mr. G. M. Trevelyan.² This account of the rebellion, written in French very shortly after the tragic events in London, contains exceedingly precise and, in the main, trustworthy information. In addition Mr. Trevelyan has published with Mr. Powell a number of documents hitherto unedited,³ and has devoted to the rising of 1381 a chapter in his striking work on England in the time of Wycliffe.⁴ Mr. G. Kriehn has examined the sources and certain details of the subject in an article which seemed to foreshadow a more elaborate publication.⁵ A book by Mr. Oman, put together somewhat hastily, uses most of the works which we have just mentioned, and contains some interesting remarks on the collection of the Poll Tax.⁶

The causes of the rising have been made clearer by monographs or articles on the fourteenth century

1. See my Preface to Réville's work, pp. xii sqq.

2. An Account of the Rising of 1381 in Eng. Hist. Rev., 1898, pp. 509 sqq. Compare Kriehn's Memoir cited below, n. 5.

3. The Peasants' Rising and the Lollards, a Collection of Unpublished Documents.

4. England in the Age of Wycliffe, 1899. About the same time there appeared in Russian a book which it would be well to translate for the use of western historians: Vozstanie Uota Tailera, by Professor D. Petrushevsky. In the first part he deals with the rebellion; in the second with its causes and with the fourteenth century manor. See the review of the second part by M. Savine in the Eng. Hist. Rev., 1902, pp. 780 sqq. I much regret my inability to make use of Mr. Petrushevsky's work.

5. Studies in the Sources of the Social Revolt in 1381, in Amer. Hist. Rev., vol. vii, 1901-2.

6. The Great Revolt of 1381. The reader should refer to the critical review of Mr. Tait, especially in regard to Mr. Oman's study on the Poll Tax (Eng. Hist. Rev., 1907).

manor,¹ and by an excellent study by Miss Putnam, showing how the Statute of Labourers was put into force.² Finally, books and essays on political, municipal, religious, and economic history have given us more exact knowledge of the conditions in which the rebellion arose.³

With the assistance of these new authorities I have attempted a second sketch, necessarily much shorter than my first. I have fortunately been able to follow the main lines of my previous study; but I have modified and corrected it where necessary, made some important additions, and abandoned one or two theories.⁴ I hope, however, that on the whole my readers will recognise the soundness of the main conclusions which the documents collected by Réville enabled me to publish fifteen years ago.

1. F. G. Davenport, Economic Development of a Norfolk Manor; A. Clark, Serfdom on an Essex Manor, 1308-78, in the Eng. Hist. Rev., 1905; K. G. Feiling, An Essex Manor in the Fourteenth Century, in Eng. Hist. Rev., 1911.

2. Bertha H. Putnam, Enforcement of the Statutes of Labourers during the first decade after the Black Death, 1349-59, in Columbia University Studies in History, vol. xxxii, 1908. Compare the same author's Justices of Labourers in the Fourteenth Century, in Eng. Hist. Rev., 1906.

3. For example, C. T. Flower, The Beverley Town Riots, 1381-2 (Trans. Royal Hist. Soc., New Series, vol. xix); J. Gairdner, Lollardy and the Reformation in England, vol. i; E. P. Cheyney, Disappearance of English Serfdom, in Eng. Hist. Rev., 1900.

4. Especially that in regard to the feelings of the lower classes concerning the exactions of the Papacy. See below, p. 272, n. 2.

(1)

CAUSES OF THE RISING.

Stubbs wisely laid stress on the complex character of the movement of 1381, and on its strange and somewhat inconsistent features; but he gave a very insufficient explanation of it, and certain inferences which he derived from Rogers are now shown to be unsound. Why in this particular year did the rural population of certain counties rise in a general rebellion? Why do we find among the rebels many artisans and merchants? Why were the boldest and most violent leaders often ecclesiastics—country priests and chaplains? Why was popular hatred directed against the most influential counsellors of the young king, such as John of Gaunt, Sudbury the archbishop of Canterbury, and Hales the treasurer? What were the grounds of the hatred shown against the judges and the sheriffs, the escheators and the tax-collectors? What was the reason of the massacre of foreign merchants or of the attacks on the municipal authorities in certain towns? How can we explain the unrestrained and unresisted pillage in vast districts? From whence did these armies of brigands suddenly appear, as if they had sprung out of the ground? How was it possible for such diverse movements to occur simultaneously? Were there general causes which operated in all parts? Had the rising on the whole a political character, or must we regard it as a social upheaval provoked by communistic agitators? Had it religious causes, and did Lollardy, then in its infancy, contribute to it? The events of 1381 suggest these questions, and we believe that the documents which have been published will enable us to answer them.

On a careful examination of the records, it appears that, in order to explain most of the features—sometimes very astonishing ones—which we have just enumerated, we must go back to two conspicuous facts of general history which dominate the second half of the fourteenth century in England, namely, the Black Death, and the war with France.

The Black Death, which ravaged England from August 1348 to the end of 1349,¹ and made another visit in 1361, carried off perhaps a half of the population, caused a remarkable disturbance in production, wages, and prices, and led to profound changes in the relations between employers and workmen, sellers and consumers. The war with France drove the crown to lavish expenditure and the raising of heavy taxes. It moreover occasioned an increase of disorder and a decline of morals. From the plague and the war issued economic calamities and revolutionary sentiments which explain the rising of 1381.

We shall first examine the effects of the plague in the rural districts. As Mr. Ashley justly observes, “to understand the rural life of England during this period is to understand nine-tenths of its economic activity.”² Moreover, it was in the country villages that the rebellion took its rise.

In his great History of Agriculture and Prices Thorold Rogers argues that in the fourteenth century the villeins³ had “almost all” been released from the burden of forced labour, for which money payments had been substituted. He was

1. And not from May 31 to Sept. 29, 1349, as Stubbs asserts, vol. ii, p. 418 n. See Charles Creighton, History of Epidemics in Britain, vol. i, chap. iii; F. A. Gasquet, The Great Pestilence.

2. Introduction to English Economic History, 2nd edit., vol. i, pt. i, p. 6.

3. It must not be forgotten that in England at this time “villein” and “serf” were synonymous. See my study on the Origins of the Manor (supra, i. 1 sqq.); cf. Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii. 475.

led from this to an inference regarding the origins of the rebellion. According to him, the landed aristocracy, compelled, by the abolition of villein services, to employ hired labourers to cultivate their own demesnes, found their interests threatened by the rise in the price of labour after the Black Death, and wished therefore to return to the old system. This reaction infuriated their tenants and was one of the chief causes of the revolt of 1381.¹ Stubbs accepted this theory,² which Rogers himself maintained very positively in later works.³ It was rejected—though rather too hastily—by Mr. Ashley.⁴ As far as it concerns the substitution of money payments for labour dues, Rogers' theory is not false; it is merely exaggerated: but in regard to the restoration of the previous system, it is based on mere conjecture, and even if the theory should be confirmed by the discovery of new documents, it would explain to only a small extent the grievances of the peasants. It is evident that the main causes of their discontent must be sought elsewhere.

In my analysis of the manorial records collected principally by Réville, I have shown that the substitution of money rents for labour services had only just begun when the Black Death came and reduced by one-half the supply of labour and raised all prices.⁵ At the same time, Mr. Page was also studying the question, and after extensive researches he arrived at identical conclusions.⁶ Up to 1348, in fact, labour services seem to have been rendered in the majority of manors, and in those where money payments existed they had been instituted for special

Objections to Rogers' theory

1. Hist. of Agriculture and Prices in England, i. 81 sqq.
2. See Stubbs' Const. Hist., ii. 476-7.
3. Six Centuries of Work and Wages, edit. 1908, pp. 253 sqq.; Economic Interpretation of History, p. 29.
4. Op. cit. i, pt. ii, pp. 265 sqq.
5. See my Introduction historique to Réville's book, pp. xxiii sqq.
6. Umwandlung der Frohndienste, especially pp. 22 sqq. See also Miss Davenport, Economic Development of a Norfolk Manor, p. 52.

reasons, varying according to place and circumstance, but unconnected with a desire to improve the villein's lot. In the first half of the fourteenth century, it sometimes even happened that the system of commutation operated to the evident disadvantage of the villeins, and that while continuing to perform week-work, they were thenceforward compelled to pay a pecuniary compensation whenever their services were not actually required.¹ In short, it is true that labour dues had begun to disappear, but the institution of money rents was not always a gain for the peasant, and it was far from general. A return to the old system, therefore, cannot be, as Rogers urges, "the key to the insurrection of Wat Tyler." Rogers, moreover, cites no document which proves that this reaction occurred, and the researches of Mr. Page have convinced him that, on the contrary, in the years immediately before the revolt the tendency towards the substitution of money payments for labour became stronger rather than weaker.² No doubt in manors where the change had taken place disputes may have arisen in the way that Rogers suggests; but there is no reason to believe that such cases were frequent.

"The key to the insurrection" must therefore be found elsewhere. We have to discover what happened as a result of the plague, and how the lords came into conflict with the peasants.

The Black Death had been most fatal to the lower classes, who lived in very insanitary conditions.³ Whole villages were depopulated. Of those able to work, a great number of free tenants and villeins perished. The agricultural labourers, farm servants, road-menders, and the reapers

Rise in wages
after the plague

1. Maitland, Hist. of a Cambridgeshire Manor (Eng. Hist. Rev., 1894, pp. 418 sqq.). Compare my Introd. Historique, p. xxiv.

2. Umwandlung, pp. 40 sqq.

3. See the preamble of the Ordinance of 1349, in Foedera, Rec. ed., iii, pt. i, 198; or in Miss Putnam's Enforcement of the Statutes of Labourers, Appendix, p. 8*.

who came from the towns for the harvest season, were also decimated; and the survivors profited by the situation to demand higher wages. Rogers has calculated that after the plague rural wages rose 48 per cent.¹ The judicial documents recently published by Miss Putnam confirm those used by Rogers. They show that reapers frequently received 5d. or 6d. a day instead of the 2d. or 3d. which they earned before the plague. Haymakers, instead of 5d., demanded 9d., 10d., and even 1/- or 1/2d. an acre.²

The small holders, and especially the villeins, observing this rise of wages, strove to benefit by it; and many left their holdings to offer themselves as hired labourers. This is a notable fact, the importance of which cannot be exaggerated. Villeins fled from their manors much more frequently than before. With this exodus following so closely on the plague, the landowners saw their manors becoming devoid of workers.³ All the manorial records show us that vacant holdings were very numerous and that tenants could not be found to occupy them. The landlord was already unable to cultivate his own demesne by means of labour services. We may mention, for example, the state of things described by Miss Davenport in her valuable study on the manor of Forncett in Norfolk. Out of 3,219 day's works in winter, summer, and autumn, 1,452 in 1376-77, and 1,722 in 1377-78, could no longer be obtained. It was not that the labour services had been converted into a pecuniary tax; there was in the manor only one holding where this change had been carried out; but the tenants had disappeared in large numbers, whether through the extinction of whole

Small holdings deserted

1. Hist. of Agric., i. 265 sqq., 687.

2. Miss Putnam, Enforcement, p. 90.

3. For examples, see Maitland, History of a Camb. Manor, pp. 423 sqq.; Miss Davenport, op. cit., pp. 72 sqq.; Page, op. cit., pp. 38 sqq. and note 27.

families or through departures from the district.¹ If the demesne was to be cultivated on the same lines as before, it was therefore necessary to have recourse to agricultural labourers; but their claims had doubled. And what was to be done with deserted holdings outside the demesne?

To avoid ruin, certain lords no doubt took up sheep rearing, which required few hands. English sheep, moreover, had a high reputation, and their wool had for long been famous. But this policy involved a revolution which could not be rapidly accomplished, and in fact it was mainly after the beginning of the following century that it was very gradually carried into effect.

Most of the landholders continued to practise agriculture as best they could. Often they went so far as to lease both their demesne and also the empty holdings, and in this way serfs as well as free peasants received land on advantageous conditions. It was perhaps in order to keep their villeins that the lords of certain manors abandoned the system of labour services after the plague.² At any rate it is evident that in many cases they thought it wise and profitable to make concessions. In France, in the same way, the calamities of the Hundred Years' War forced the nobility and the church to enfranchise the serfs in a body. It is also certain that the English landowners were often driven to pay their hands very high wages, and that they fought amongst themselves for a supply of labour, seeking to attract villeins from other estates and enticing labourers who were working in the neighbourhood. The legal cases of

Remedies.
Sheep-breeding

Concessions made to obtain labour

1. Miss Davenport, op. cit., pp. 51 sqq.; see also Page, op. cit., p. 35 and note 22.

2. Thus in 1352 all the labour dues were changed into pecuniary rents in the manor of Castle Combe (Page, op. cit., p. 33, n. 18). The motive of this substitution is not quite clear: the rise in the price of food may have made it to the lord's interest to abolish the labour services, for a meal was generally given to those performing them. See the examples of these meals in my Introduction, p. xxvi, n. 4; p. xxvii, n. 4; p. xxviii, n. 1.

which we are about to speak prove this clearly. Constrained by circumstances, the aristocracy thus helped to develop the class of free-tenants, farmers, and well-paid labourers who, after repeatedly raising their demands at the expense of the higher orders, turned against them in 1381.¹

Besides these landlords of opportunistic temperament, there were others more tenacious and strong-willed, who were eager to maintain their rights and their ancient methods of cultivation. It is not surprising to find among them a number of churchmen. In England, as in France, ecclesiastical landlords administered their estates during the Middle Ages with scrupulous and severe vigilance.² At this time, they took the earliest opportunity of undoing any changes they had made. Thus the court rolls of the manor of Hutton, which belonged to Battle Abbey, show the abbot driven to lease vacant holdings in 1349 and the following years, but letting them for only a short term—twelve years at most. After 1355 he concluded new arrangements for one year only, raising the rents and returning to the old system of tenure whenever he had a good chance to do so.³

A number of manors, especially those in the hands of monasteries, had lords of the same temper as the abbot of Battle. A certain number of manorial records dating from the years immediately before the revolt bear witness to the rigor-

Resistance of certain landowners

The burdens of villeinage
maintained

1. It should be noticed that in England the plague only assisted a development which the disastrous famines of the reign of Edward II had rendered necessary. Wages had begun to rise as early as the first half of the fourteenth century and an increase in the numbers of free holdings and farms had already appeared before 1350 (see my Introduction, pp. xxix sqq.). But the decline in population caused by the plague accelerated the movement, and gave rise to new ambitions.

2. Their covetousness was a theme of reproach. In the Year Books of Edward II (iv. 69) there appears this gibe of Justice Bereford at the bishop of Hereford: "Gentz de seinte Eglise ont une merveillouse manere: s'ils eient le pée en la terre a akun homme, il volent avoir tut le corps."

3. K. G. Feiling, Essex Manor, Eng. Hist. Rev., 1911, p. 335.

ous maintenance of the burdens of villeinage, and to the differences which were thus caused between the lords and the villeins. The dispute over labour services did not arise in the way Rogers supposed; no attempt was made to revive an obsolete institution; the lords merely desired the continuance of obligations which were still in existence, although no longer compatible with the progress of the labouring class. Dues of various kinds were sternly exacted, and the personal disabilities of the villeins inexorably maintained. The manorial courts showed no mercy to the villein who without leave had married his daughter, sent his son to school, or sold a fowl.¹ Fifteen years after the plague the villeins of the manor of Hutton saw the lord abbot buy for their benefit such instruments of correction as a pillory and a ducking-stool; and from 1366 to 1368 the number of fines inflicted in the manorial court increased three-fold.² We have numerous proofs of the severity shown by certain lords. Men of moderate views like the pious William Langland were horrified, and offered the unsuccessful advice: "When you inflict a fine, let mercy fix its amount." In his sermons, Wycliffe vainly rebuked the lords for ruining the poor with fines.³ The victims had no legal means of escape. The villeins were still at the mercy of their lord, with the sole protection of manorial custom. The courts of common law were more strictly closed to them than ever; no villein could bring an action against his lord. And when they ran away, they were pursued and put in prison.

The contrast between their legal condition and the new prosperity which the economic crisis had brought to the

1. See my Introduction historique, pp. xxxvi, sqq.; and Réville's essay on the rising of the peasants at St. Albans, pp. 5 sqq.

2. Feiling, op. cit., p. 335. See also in the Chronica Monasterii de Melsa, ed. Bond. (R. S.), iii. 126 sqq., the account of the troubles between the abbot of Meaux and his villeins about 1358.

3. See my Introduction historique, p. xxxvi.

The law and economic changes labouring class in general, was for the villeins a source of continual irritation. Even those who were badly treated by their lords had benefited through the general rise of prices. At least up to the death of Edward III, they could make large profits on the sale of their produce, for the price of corn and cattle did not decline till the last quarter of the century.¹ But the burden of serfdom seemed to them only the more insupportable.

Nothing was therefore more natural than the efforts they made to free themselves by means of concerted action. The movement became so general that in 1377 the matter was put before the king by parliament. According to the lords and the knights of the shires, the villeins were conspiring to refuse their "customs and services" and claimed that they were "free from every kind of serfdom." They threatened with death the officers of their lords, and refused to obey the decisions of the manorial courts. They supported their claims by passages from Domesday Book.² They gathered on the roads, and joined in "confederacies" to make resistance to their lords.³ The statute of 1377, which authorised proceedings against the conspirators, failed to overcome their obstinacy.⁴ The general refusal of "works, customs, and services," in the counties which rebelled in 1381, was thus only the extension of a movement already in existence.

The statute of 1377 was not the only weapon which the landowners obtained from the crown and from parliament. Another had been given at the very beginning of

1. See the lists of prices in the first vol. of Rogers' History of Agriculture and Prices.

2. Without doubt because the services were not expressly mentioned. See the very sound remarks by Mr. Tait in his review of Mr. Oman's work (Eng. Hist. Rev., 1907, pp. 161 sqq.).

3. See the text of the statute of 1377 in Statutes, vol. ii, pp. 2 sqq.; or in my Introduction historique, pp. xxxvii-xxxviii.

4. For an instance of a league of villeins in 1380 to withhold from a lord his "consuetudines et servicia," see my Introduction, p. xxxix, n. 4.

the crisis to employers and consumers as against workmen and vendors of commodities, namely, the ordinance and statutes "to restrain the malice of servants" and to obviate "the outrageous dearness of victuals."^r

While the plague was still raging and it was impossible for parliament to assemble, the royal council had taken vigorous measures. An ordinance had been published on 18 June, 1349.¹ It compelled men and women under sixty, having no means of support, to work when they should be required; they and all other labourers had to accept the wages usually paid in 1346, or in the five or six years before. Breaches of contract were forbidden. Penalties were imposed on all those who should violate the ordinance, including employers who offered wages above the legal rate. Retailers of food and innkeepers were to charge reasonable prices.

The statute of 9 February, 1351, made the law more precise, and fixed at a definite amount many kinds of wages. It was afterwards re-issued and made more severe. A statute of January 1361 ordained that labourers who went from county to county seeking higher wages should be branded on the forehead with a red-hot iron. The commons, especially from 1377 to 1380, were continually clamouring for the enforcement of the law.²

In certain respects this legislation was a complete novelty. Of course mediæval notions concerning the regulation of labour easily led to intervention of this kind. In the towns, it was usual for wages and prices to be controlled by the municipal authorities. The local courts, whether of the county, the hundred, or the manor, had for long concerned themselves with the relations between employers, workmen, and consumers; but agri-

1. In the Foedera it is dated 1350, and the mistake has passed into my Introduction to Réville's book. The exact date is to be found in Statutes, vol. i, pp. 307 sqq.; and in Miss Putnam, Appendix, pp. 8*-12*.

2. Statutes, i. 311 sqq., 366 sqq., etc.; Miss Putnam, pp. 12*-18*.

cultural wages had never been subjected to an official limitation, and free labourers had never been forced to reside in a certain district. It was natural that the government should listen to the complaints of employers and consumers, and seek remedies for an unprecedented crisis which threatened to ruin the whole nation¹ ; but it could not reconcile interests diametrically opposed to each other, and its policy excited furious indignation.

This policy was persistent and vigorous. On the enforcement of the ordinance and the statutes, Miss Putnam's solid work has thrown an entirely new light, and one can only regret that, as regards the greater part of the subject, the researches of this scholar come to an end at the year 1359. The ancient popular courts sometimes dealt with offences against the statutes of labourers ; but it was to the advantage of the lords, who were granted the fines paid by their tenants, that such cases should come before the royal tribunals. As a rule, offenders were tried by special commissions of " justices of labourers," or by commissions charged at the same time with the conservation of the peace.² The statute of 1368, in fact, entirely transferred to the justices of the peace the functions of the justices of labourers. The class from which these guardians of public order were chosen was

Enforcement of the Statutes

1. The English government was not the only one to take such measures. In France, and in particular at Paris, the Black Death also caused a rise in wages, and the king published an ordinance (30 Jan., 1351) which it is interesting to compare with the English ordinance. See Ordonnances, ii. 352 sqq. ; R. Eberstadt, Das französische Gewerbe-recht vom dreizehnten Jahrhundert bis 1581, pp. 163 sqq. ; Fagniez, Docum. relatifs à l'hist. de l'Industrie et du commerce en France, ii. xxviii sqq.

2. It was natural that the same commissioners should be charged with the keeping of the peace and the execution of the statutes of labourers. Even during the period when special commissions were appointed, that is to say, from 1352 to 1359, out of 501 commissioners who were nominated as " justices of labourers," there were 299 who in the preceding years had been justices of the peace. Among these 501 there were a few lawyers and municipal officials, but most were rural landowners. Parliament made constant efforts, which were generally in vain, to obtain control of the appointments.

the most conservative in the country—the class which already controlled local administration and furnished the members of the house of commons, and which had the greatest interest in the maintenance of the old economic conditions—namely, the middle class of the rural districts.

Each “commission of labourers,” appointed at fixed salaries, exercised jurisdiction in a single county, or more commonly in a subdivision of a county, and tried cases with the assistance of a jury of presentment and a petty jury.

The
commissions of labourers

As far as can be gathered from the reports which are still extant, “excesses” of wages and prices were the offences with which the commissioners had most often to deal, but they concerned themselves with almost all the cases provided for in the statutes. They sometimes even turned their attention to dividing the supply of labour among the employers. The abbot of Pipwell complained that they compelled his tenants to work for those in competition with him, and that at a time when he had land lying fallow through lack of labour; and the king pointed out to the justices that it was not reasonable to deprive the abbot of the help of his tenants when he had need of them, and was ready to pay legal wages.¹ It is evident that the commissioners were very active and very tyrannical.

The commissioners often inflicted sentences of imprisonment, but they generally imposed fines, or else simply condemned the offender, whether labourer or employer, to pay the excessus—that is, the difference between the legal wage and the wage given. Every year the fines and the excessus amounted to a sum large enough to be coveted. During the first years it was used, at the request of parliament, to relieve taxation. Subsequently the lords succeeded in securing for themselves the sums which their respective tenants were condemned to pay.

Fines

1. Miss Putnam, Appendix, p. 218.*

Cases more difficult to decide were the actions for breach of contract. These were generally brought either before the King's Bench, or more frequently before the Court of Common Pleas. Miss Putnam conjectures that from 1351 to 1377 the two supreme courts dealt with 9,000 of these actions, brought by employers against men who left their work before the end of their contract, or against other employers who had enticed their labourers from them. Here again we see that the statutes were very widely interpreted, and that schoolmasters, chaplains, bailiffs, and esquires were regarded as bound to their masters by the terms of these laws.

It was in such ways that the statutes were put into force. The royal council watched narrowly over their administration, and often recalled commissioners and suppressed abuses. There can be no doubt that the advisers of Edward III and Richard II were honestly trying to avert a catastrophe, without any intention of oppressing the labourers, of filling the treasury with the produce of the fines, or of increasing the authority of the crown. They did not succeed in stopping the increase of wages and prices, for in the years immediately before the revolt the commons were continually complaining that the statutes were not observed; but it is beyond question that they retarded the rise of rural wages, and the break-up of the manorial system.¹ The object which the government persistently and honestly pursued was the maintenance of the old social organisation.

For this very reason the execution of the ordinance of 1349 and of the subsequent statutes exasperated the smallholders and labourers of the country districts. It was not unknown for every workman within the jurisdiction of a

Action of the supreme courts

Aims of the government

Unpopularity
of the justices

It is impossible to accept Stubbs' assertion that the statutes produced no effect whatever (Const. Hist., ii, 473).

commission of labourers to refuse the oath to obey the statute; and sometimes the commissioners were attacked and threatened with death.¹ In 1381 the rebellious peasants seized the justices and broke open the prisons. All of whatever degree who were connected with the administration of the law became objects of the same hatred, and were regarded as enemies of the people.

The results of the Black Death were equally striking in the towns. In the fourteenth century town life was beginning to assume some importance. At the accession of Richard II, London had 40,000 inhabitants, York and Bristol 12,000, Plymouth and Coventry 9,000, Norwich, Lincoln, Salisbury, Lynn, and Colchester between 5,000 and 7,000.² Industries were multiplying and becoming more specialised. The guilds of artificers (craft guilds) were developing by the side of the merchant guilds. There were forty-eight of them in London at the end of the reign of Edward III. The woollen industry was bringing much wealth to the towns of Norfolk.³ The plague carried off hundreds in the narrow streets of the towns as it did in the cottages of the peasants, and in the towns also the high price of labour gave to the survivors an unprecedented prosperity. The records show a house-painter, a weaver, and several tailors obtaining three times as much as their previous wages.⁴ Moreover, these demands, though greatly to the disadvantage of the consumer, did not necessarily occasion trouble between masters and workmen. Most of the masters worked with their own hands, and lived on very intimate terms with their workpeople, taking counsel with them as to means of increasing their profits. Often

Effects of the Black Death on the industrial classes

1. Miss Putnam, pp. 76, 93 sqq.

2. Ashley, Economic History, i, pt. ii, p. 11, based on the Poll Tax Rolls of 1377.

3. Ibid., i, pt. i, pp. 86 sqq., pt. ii, pp. 70 sqq. and 209 sqq.; Gross, Gild Merchant, i, chap. 7.

4. Miss Putnam, p. 90.

indeed the journeyman was paid directly by the customer, and his work brought in nothing for his employer. As a rule, therefore, masters and workmen had the same interests, and the public suffered accordingly. The artisans offered a violent resistance to the statutes of labourers. They refused to serve those who would not give them high wages.¹ They broke their contracts in order to work for those who offered more.² They formed "leagues, confederacies, and conspiracies" to keep up the price of labour.³ They forcibly opposed the execution of corporal punishments imposed by the justices of labourers.⁴ They supplied to the rebel hordes of 1381 numerous recruits and several leaders. In London the participation of the artisans gave the rising a character of ferocious brutality.

The germ of the revolt in the towns was the same as in the country. In both, those of the working classes who had survived the plague had greatly benefited by the economic crisis which it had caused, and they wished to maintain and even increase their prosperity. Froissart, who was much better informed concerning these events than has generally been supposed, acutely says: "This rebellion was caused and excited by the great ease and plenty in which the meaner folk of England lived." Gower and Langland re-echo the lamentations of the middle classes over the demands of servants and workmen. They must have good fare of flesh or fish, dishes well cooked, "chaude or plus chaud";⁵ and in a judicial document recently published we actually

1. "Rogerus de Melbourne, faber, renuit servire vicinos et servit extraneos causa excessivi," Putnam, App., p. 165.*

2. Even when they were employed in the service of the king. See Foed., Rec. ed., iii, pt. ii, 613 sqq. (A.D. 1361).

3. Statutes, i, 367.

4. Putnam, App., p. 167.*

5. See the passages cited in my Introd., pp. xl and xlviii sqq.; also Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii. 476, n. 1.

read of a carter who left a town because his employer would not pay him by the day or give him fresh meat.¹ In town and country alike the workers were now conscious of their strength, jealous in defence of their comfort and their pleasures, and ready to attack the lords, the rich, and the king's officers, who were endeavouring to deprive them of their new prosperity. Where serfdom still existed, the villeins ran away to offer themselves as journeymen, or else they formed unions to refuse their services.

The merchants and tradesmen were also affected by the laws of Edward III, which punished on the one hand retailers of food and innkeepers if they raised their prices, and on the other hand those who adulterated goods or strove to create monopolies. This class, divided by terrible feuds, was profoundly affected by the rebellion. It provided the rebels with victims as well as leaders; for English capitalists,² and still more foreigners under the protection of the crown, like the Flemings and the Lombards, were persecuted, robbed, and murdered. During these days the small traders had their chance of revenging old wrongs and gratifying their jealousy.³

To anyone unfamiliar with the history of the English Church at this period, it must seem strange to find many priests and chaplains among the most dangerous of the popular leaders of 1381. The anarchist preacher, John Ball, was listened to as a "prophet" by the rebels of the south-east. In Essex, in Hertfordshire, Cambridgeshire and Suffolk—almost everywhere in fact—the lower clergy were deeply involved in the rising.

Clerks with small benefices and the stipendiary clergy, the two classes which furnished these rebels, had been

1. Putnam, App., p. 196.*.

2. See the article by Alice Law, The English 'Nouveaux Riches' in the Fourteenth Century (Trans. Royal Hist. Soc., New Series, ix, 49 sqq.).

3. See the documents cited in my Introd., pp. xlvii sqq., li sqq.

greatly affected by the Black Death.¹ Obligated by their duty to come into contact with the sick, the parish priests were perhaps of all Englishmen the most hard hit by the pestilence. In East Anglia more than eight hundred parishes were deprived of their priests in a single year. Eighty-three lost two in rapid succession, and ten saw three perish in a few months. In some districts no one could be found to administer the sacraments to the dying. Extraordinary measures had to be taken. The bishops ordained young clerks who had not reached the canonical age and men without learning or of doubtful antecedents. As a result of this difficulty in filling their ranks, the boorishness of the rural clergy, already notorious in normal times, became still worse. In addition, the dearth of food made them more wretched and greedy than ever. Very often they failed to obtain the increase of income which they needed in order to exist. Sooner than accept a cure and fast there for ever, many clerks adopted a wandering life, selling their ministrations to the peasants, accepting posts as private chaplains or chantry priests, and demanding stipends which were sometimes large enough to bring them before the justices of labourers. So even in the Church the Black Death gave rise to a wages problem, and drove on to the highways, by the side of labourers in quest of good pay, bands of vagabonds in holy orders, disposed to share and excite the bitter feelings of the people.²

The higher clergy, consisting of younger sons of the nobility, worldly, greedy, corrupt in morals, did nothing to relieve the miseries and mollify the concealed indignation of this ecclesiastical proletariat. By their insensibility they suggested themselves as an object of attack.

Effects of the Black Death on the clergy

Indifference of the higher clergy

1. For what follows see especially A. Jessopp, "The Black Death in East Anglia" in The Coming of the Friars and other historic Essays.

2. See the documents printed by Miss Putnam, App., pp. 147*, 171*, 194*.

Whereas a parish priest could no longer live on less than ten marks a year, archbishop Islip ordained the suspension of all those who demanded more than five or six marks; and this great prelate drew up a grandiloquent invective against the covetousness of the priests, "gorged with excessive revenues."¹ It is not surprising that one of his successors, Sudbury, who was among the best prelates of the time, should in 1381 have paid with his head for the accumulated sins of the higher clergy. It is not surprising that the despised and starving priests, the wretched holders of chantries, and the wandering clerks, should have led the peasants to the assault of episcopal manors and wealthy monasteries.²

It has been shown that the events of 1381 owed their origin in particular to the Black Death and its economic and social consequences. To a less but

ii. Results of the French War

still important extent the French war had also prepared the way for a revolution. In the first place, it had made the English discontented. It necessitated heavy exactions, especially the Poll Tax, which proved to be the exciting cause of the rising. It rendered unpopular a government which, despite such heavy subsidies, had lost all its French

Unpopularity of the government

possessions, and could not even protect the English coasts from the descents of French privateers, or the border counties of the north from the raids of the Scots.³ When taxes grow and security

1. The document is cited by W. W. Capes, English Church in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries, p. 78. Islip was archbishop of Canterbury from 1349 to 1366.

2. I have abandoned the theory that the exactions of the Papacy may have contributed to the popular discontent (cf. my Introduction, p. 1). It does not appear that the insurgents complained of them. It is remarkable that where they meddled with disputes as to the tenure of benefices or prebends they supported clerks who had received a papal provision. At Bury the people took the side of Edmund Brownfield, who, being provided by the pope to the abbey, had been imprisoned by the king in accordance with the Statute of Provisors (see Réville, pp. 65-6; Powell, pp. 15 sqq.). At Salisbury and Bridgewater the people likewise supported a provisor (see my Introd., p. cix).

3. See my Introduction, pp. lv sqq.

declines, the government always receives the blame. The costly and disastrous war with France produced a hatred of "traitors." In 1381 the English saw traitors everywhere, like the French republicans in 1793.

The war had also tended to brutalise the nation. In the years immediately before the rising, the rolls of parliament, the statutes, and the royal letters leave the impression that great disorder prevailed in the country. Crimes of violence were very frequent. Armed bands were organised, not only for robbery, but to gratify private ambitions, to abduct heiresses, to take possession of a manor, or to terrorise the justices. During the campaigns in France the nobles had acquired lawless habits. They had retainers whose interests they maintained by force; they kept troops of swashbucklers; and in Nov. 1381 parliament pointed to this custom of "maintenance" as one of the causes of the revolt.¹ Moreover, these armies of lawbreakers were easily recruited, for many of the brigands of all countries who had formerly served under Edward III and the Black Prince, had come to England since Charles V and Du Guesclin had driven them from France. A few, like the sometime weaver, Robert Knolles, had made their fortunes and become pillars of the throne. Knolles helped to suppress the rebellion in 1381; but others who had been less lucky were tramping the highways,² ready for any desperate enterprise, and sharing the lot of fugitive villeins, labourers wanted by the authorities, and wandering

1. Rot Parl., vol. iii, 100, sect. 17.

2. They were a subject of complaint as early as the time of the Treaty of Brétigny. According to a statute of 34 Ed. III the justices of the peace were to "informer et enquere de touz ceux qi ont este pilours et robeours es parties de dela, et sont ore revenuez et vont vagantz et ne voillent travailler come ils soleient avant ses hours." In 1363 the king wrote to Warin de l'Isle that horrible robberies had been committed in Wiltshire, Berks, and Hants by "malefactores . . . qui nuper de pillagio et latrocinio in partibus exteris vixerunt" (see the documents published by C. G. Crump and C. Johnson, The Powers of Justices of the Peace, Eng. Hist. Rev., 1912, pp. 234, 236-7).

or excommunicate clergy. There can be no doubt that in 1381 bands of rebels were frequently led by old soldiers, both English and foreign, accustomed to pillage and bloodshed, whether for gain or for the gratification of their brutal passions. The exploits of these bands, their daring, their sudden raids, strongly remind one of the great Companies—a name, indeed, by which they sometimes called themselves.¹

Certain events of 1381 must be ascribed to causes of a much less general character. They might have occurred at other times even if the great rebellion had never broken out, and they were often episodes in long local quarrels which had begun many years before. They were connected with the revolt, however, by more than mere coincidence. Thus, in several towns, the news of the insurrection in the south-eastern counties stimulated the common people to rise up against the oligarchy who held the municipal government. Other towns, like St. Albans and Bury St. Edmunds, renewed their previous efforts to shake off the strict control of their lords. Others, again, which were jealous of their neighbours, used the opportunity to gratify old grudges. Yarmouth, for instance, on which commercial privileges had been conferred by the king, was invaded by the inhabitants of the adjacent districts, and its charter was torn up.² Finally, numerous people made use of the insurrection to revenge themselves on their personal enemies.

Whether one considers its principal or its secondary causes, it is true to say that the revolt of 1381 was, so to speak, a settlement of old scores of every kind. It was above all an eruption of long-cherished envy, hatred, and malice—feelings which had every excuse—towards the selfishness of the rich. It is Secondary and local causes

The rising lacking in unity

1. "Dixit quod ipse est nuntius magne societatis et missus est ad villam Sancti Edmundi predicti ad faciendum communitatem eiusdem ville surgere" (Powell, Rising in East Anglia, p. 127).

2. Réville, op. cit., p. 109.

consequently most instructive to the historian. But for the same reason it altogether lacked unity, it was not inspired by a single noble idea, and it was directed by demagogues of only mediocre ability. It had some of the characteristics of a political movement, of a religious movement, and especially of a social movement; but none of these terms defines it sufficiently, and even if one uses all three to describe it, there is still a danger of giving a false impression.

We cannot call it a political rising unless all manner of qualifications are at once added. It was, in fact, inspired by very different sentiments in different regions, and there were districts where the rebels showed no desire for a change of ministers. Nowhere was there any thought of a dynastic revolution. In several counties, it is true, "kings of the commons" made their appearance; but they were incendiaries without any programme --mere leaders of rebel bands. Even in the south-eastern counties, where the government was very unpopular, the rebels affected a high regard for the person of the king. A careful distinction was drawn between him and the "traitors" who surrounded him.

Several "traitors" atoned with their lives for the humiliation and the misfortunes of England, but these murders were not the outcome of a calculated policy. They were inspired by childish hatred. This naïve feeling had no connection with any political scheme. No one suggested any way of doing better than the men in power, and there was no reasonable motive for substituting new ministers for those in control of affairs. Neither the king, nor as a rule the very persons who were insulted with the name of "traitors," were at all responsible for the evils under which the realm was suffering. Sudbury and Hales were honourable men. The Duke of Lancaster, in regard to whom the rebels were by no means in without a political programme

The rebels

Hatred of traitors

agreement,¹ was rather foolish than dangerous. All of them were involved in extraordinary difficulties. Disorder had for many years been general. The financial problem was insoluble. Unpopular as the taxes were, they were yet indispensable, since parliament itself was not ready to take the responsibility of making peace with France. The luxury of the Court, of which so much was said, was not peculiar to England. The king of France and the duke of Burgundy, in particular, were certainly no less extravagant than Edward III and Richard II. The difficulties would not have been solved by reducing the staff of the king's household. The truth was that England was paying for Edward III's ambitious policy and careless administration. It was not by cutting off the heads of several ministers without suggesting anybody to take their place that the prestige and prosperity of England were to be restored. The political situation was certainly serious, and contributed to the general discontent; but for many reasons, and especially because they had no clear idea of the reforms which were needed, the rebels were incapable of effecting any improvement. Their very leaders had no political programme.

Nor were the rebels of 1381 heretics. It may be regarded as proved that Wycliffe had no influence on the revolt.² Lollardy was still in its infancy.

Were religious influences
at work?

The insurgents were not Lollards; they nowhere denied the spiritual powers of the clergy; they nowhere injured the statues or pictures of the saints. But this does not exclude the possibility that very revolutionary notions about a Christian democracy were in the air, and that many felt a strong contempt for the vices of the higher clergy and

1. See Stubbs, ii. 472.

2. See my Introduction, pp. lxiii sqq.; Trevelyan, England in the Age of Wycliffe, pp. 195 sqq.; Gairdner, Lollardy and the Reformation in England, i. 14 sqq.

of the profligate rich. While preaching resignation to humble folk, Wycliffe fiercely denounced the excessive wealth of the prelates and the monks. Men of moderate views, friends of the existing order, were scandalised by the prevalent corruption, and made no effort to hide their virtuous indignation. Langland's "Vision of Piers the Plowman," which was already famous, bears striking witness to this state of mind.¹ Like Wycliffe, Langland had no wish for a revolution, but the puritan fervour which inspired both might easily give birth to fanaticism in less well-regulated minds, and it did in fact exert a strong influence on certain leaders in 1381. Letters couched in obscure and grotesque language,² which were passed from hand to hand for the encouragement of the rebels, bear the impress of mysticism. It is also remarkable that during the destruction of the palace of the Savoy in London, the rebels were forbidden to steal anything on pain of death. It is, however, true that elsewhere, and even in London, the lowest greed was often the motive of the crimes they committed, and in many places the insurgents were nothing more than vulgar robbers. The ideas of the religious reformers had widespread influence only in so far as they provoked attacks against the property and the temporal power of the clergy.

To speak of a social rising would be more correct. It was not merely that the distribution of the lands of the clergy, the abolition of serfdom, the repeal of the statutes of labourers, were explicitly demanded by the rebels of Kent and Essex in their interviews with the king; but most of their doings were acts of social warfare. The nobles were terrorised and humiliated; the rich were attacked; manorial customs

Social aspects of the rising

1. See J. J. Jusserand, L'Épopée mystique de W. Langland.

2. The text of these mysterious letters is given in Knighton (R. S.), ii. 138 sqq.; Walsingham, Hist. Ang. (R. S.), ii. 33 sqq.; and translated by Oman, op. cit., pp 43 sqq.

have been expected,¹ a fact which proves that many people had fled to avoid the tax and had joined the army of vagabonds and outlaws.

The doings of these commissions put the last straw on the patience of the people. The sixteen counties where they had been set up were all, or almost all, affected by the rising. It is absolutely certain that the weight and the unjust assessment of the tax, coupled with the foolish determination of the government to get the full amount, were the direct cause of the revolt. Wherever they could, the rebels burnt the poll-tax rolls, maltreated the collectors, and sought out the sheriffs and escheators who had been commissioned to revise the assessments and to arrest those who resisted. One of their victims in London was John Leg. The evidence of the facts, the assertions of the chroniclers, and the admissions of the parliament of Nov. 1381² all point in the same direction. The peasants rose on a question of taxation; and, to repeat what was said above, they rose at this time because they were in a state of revolutionary excitement³ for the various reasons which we have mentioned.

1. The lists of the Poll Tax of 1377 furnish a total of 1,355,201 persons over fourteen years of age, and the list of 1381 a total of 896,451 persons above fifteen. In Essex and in Kent, the counties where the revolt first broke out, the figures fell from 47,962 (1377) to 30,748 (1381), and from 56,557 to 43,838 (Powell, Rising, App. I). In an otherwise interesting chapter on the Poll Tax, Mr. Oman (op. cit., pp. 22 sqq.) has, in dealing with these figures, made mistakes which have been pointed out by Mr. James Tait (Eng. Hist. Rev., 1907, p. 162).

2. See my Introduction, pp. lvii sqq.

3. "Plures ligei . . . in comitatibus Cancie et Essexie insurrexerunt et ut mala per eosdem longe ante precogitata facilius ad finem ducerent in diversas et magnas turmas se congregaverunt" (Inquisition of 1382, in Réville, op. cit., app. II, no. 10, p. 196, n. 4).

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS AND RESULTS OF THE RISING.

This is not the place for a detailed history of the revolt: and we shall limit ourselves to pointing out its character in each district and emphasising certain features which are passed over by Stubbs.

The chancery of Richard II fixed 1 May as the approximate date of the beginning of the rising,¹ and there is in fact every reason to believe that very early in the month the collection of the poll-tax occasioned disturbances in Kent and Essex. The first documents bearing a precise date refer to Essex.

Essex was a poor county, which, as we have seen, was for long subject to the oppression of the forest law. The burdens of serfdom were heavy,² and bitter discontent prevailed. The people of Essex rose in a body, villeins, artisans, and rich landholders. They played a prominent part in the movement. It was they who remained longest in arms; and they worked enthusiastically to spread the revolt, sending emissaries to distant parts with instructions. In this county the first signal of rebellion seems to have been given by the villagers of Fobbing, led by one Thomas, surnamed Baker from his trade. In consequence of the second assessment of the poll-tax, a supplementary contribution was demanded of them. They declared that they would not pay a penny more. On being "sternly threatened" by the royal commissioner, they sought help in the neighbouring villages. Certain justices of the peace were sent to Brentwood to restore order: but they were driven away on 30 May by bands from the villages along the Thames between Barking and Corringham. This was unquestionably the first centre of the insurrection.¹

1. “. . . Ipse fuisse debuit unus illorum qui Fflandrenses in Colchestre tempore rumoris, videlicet inter primum diem maii, anno regni nostri quarto, et festum Omnium Sanctorum extunc proxime sequens, interfecerunt” (Réville, op. cit., App. II, no. 61). “. . . In insurrectionibus a primo die maii anno regni nostri quarto usque festum Omnium Sanctorum tunc proxime sequens qualitercumque factis . . . ” (ibid., no. 219).

2. See especially Clark, Serfdom on an Essex Manor, 1308-78 (Eng. Hist. Rev., 1905, pp. 479 sqq.).

These events were at once reported in London, and caused great excitement. London was a restless city, a field of frequent agitations, whether political, social, or religious. In 1377 and 1378 the attempts to bring Wycliffe to trial had occasioned serious riots, and men's tempers had not been soothed by the news which for the past year had been arriving about the disturbances in Flanders and Paris. Several aldermen were hostile to the government and to William Walworth the mayor.² Some of the inhabitants³ considered that the book of the constitutions of the city was only fit to be burnt. Others were awaiting an opportunity to settle personal quarrels: among these was Thomas Faringdon, a citizen of good family, who thought he had a grievance against Robert Hales the treasurer.

1. See the inquisition published Trans. Essex Archæol. Soc., New Series, i. 218-9. Also the anonymous chronicle published by G. M. Trevelyan (An Account of the Rising of 1381, Eng. Hist. Rev., 1898, p. 510). Cf. the other documents cited in my Introduction, pp. lxx-i. The anonymous chronicler gives very full information, which corroborates what was put forward in my Introduction as to the starting-point and cause of the rising in Essex; but I cannot agree with Mr. Oman in his opinion that we should adopt this account in its entirety and prefer it to that of the inquisition.

2. William Walworth, fishmonger, was mayor from March to October, 1381. See A. B. Beaven, The Aldermen of London in the time of Richard II (Eng. Hist. Rev., 1907, p. 525).

3. As, for instance, the brewer Walter atte Keye, who on 14 June was looking for "liber de constitucionibus civitatis Londoniarum, vocatus le Jubyle," in order to burn it, and who wished to set fire to the Gildhall (Réville, op. cit., App. II, No. 32).

At the end of May or beginning of June, some of the Londoners—among them Thomas Faringdon and two butchers—went to the assistance of the bands which had just gathered in Essex to drive off the collectors and the justices. At the instigation of the new-comers, a number of Essex men set out for London, burning on their way the house of Robert Hales, and those of the sheriff and the escheator of the county.¹ Others crossed the Thames to lend help to the rebels in Kent.

Kent was not unprosperous, and villeinage was rare in the county: but, like the lower orders in London, the people were of a revolutionary temper, no doubt because it was in Kent that all military adventurers landed on their return from France. On 2 June a mob which had gathered on the right bank of the Thames, at Erith, began its exploits by invading the abbey of Lesnes;² and on the following days it marched through Dartford, Rochester, Maidstone, and Preston, forcing the monks and gentry to follow it, destroying and pillaging the houses of certain rich men, throwing open the gaols, and burning all repositories of official records. The systematic destruction of the records of the justices of the peace and the tax-collectors shows what strong feeling had been aroused by the administration of the Statutes of Labourers and the imposition of taxation. After being repeatedly reinforced by the malefactors whom they everywhere set at liberty, the rebel force reached Canterbury on 10 June. They began to seek for archbishop Sudbury, whom in their ignorance they regarded as largely responsible for the country's misfortunes. He was away, and they had to content them-

1. Réville, no. 10; Essex Archaeol. Soc. Transactions, New Series, i. 217 sqq.

2. According to the author of the anonymous chronicle edited by Mr. Trevelyan (p. 511) the initial cause of the rising in Kent was the arrest of a serf, alleged to belong to a knight of the king's household, who had him imprisoned in Rochester Castle. The rebels, if we are to believe this authority, besieged the castle in order to set him free. It is a fact that, according to one of the judicial records found by Réville (op. cit., p. 187, no. 3), a band under Robert Cave, a baker, released and carried away a certain Robert Bellyng, who had been imprisoned in the castle in question.

selves with sacking his palace and the houses of certain others whom they mistrusted, and with cutting off the heads of three "traitors."¹ At this date, the whole of east Kent was in a state of insurrection; and the district was overrun by hordes of rebels, plundering, burning the records of collectors and escheators, and breaking open prisons. In Thanet, where serfdom still existed, the services and customary dues of the villeins were declared to be abolished.²

On 11 June, the rebels of Kent and Essex who on the previous day had entered Canterbury, set out for London, headed by John Ball, whom they had just released from prison,³ and by two new leaders, March on London Jack Straw and Wat Tyler.

Jack Straw was regarded by contemporaries as one of the chief popular leaders; but we know very little either of him or of the part which he personally played.⁴ As for Wat Tyler, he suddenly appears in history during the march to Canterbury. According to the anonymous chronicler, it was after the taking of Rochester (6 June) that the men of Kent "chose as chieftain Wat Teghler of Maidstone to maintain and counsel them."⁵ The rebels passed through Maidstone on 7 June,⁶ and Tyler may have joined them there: but it is doubtful whether he was a native of Maidstone, since juries from various places in

1. The executions rest on the authority of the anonymous chronicle.

2. Flaherty, The Great Rebellion of 1381 in Kent (Archæologia Cantiana, 1860, vol. iii); Réville, App. II, nos. 1 sqq; Powell and Trevelyan, Peasants' Rising, pp. 4 sqq.; cf. the anonymous chronicle edited by Trevelyan, p. 512.

3. He was in the archbishop's prison at Maidstone (Chron. Hen. Knighton, ii. 131), which was forced on this same day, 11 June (Powell and Trevelyan, Peasants' Rising, p. 9).

4. The confession put into his mouth by the chronicler Walsingham (see Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii. 474) is, I think, almost certainly spurious. F. W. Brie (Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, Eng. Hist. Rev., 1906, pp. 106 sqq.) has tried to prove that the two names are applied in the records to one and the same person. This theory, however, cannot be accepted. The best chronicles and the rolls of parliament distinguish clearly between Wat Tyler and Jack Straw. It is likely that the latter name was a corruption of Rakestraw, and that the rebel leader was called Jack Rakestraw.

5. P. 512.

6. Réville, App., ii, nos. 1-3.

Kent—Faversham, Downhamford, and Maidstone itself—asserted that he was born in Essex.¹ Nor is it certain that he was a tiler, as a chronicler affirms,² for at this time the name no longer necessarily denoted the profession of its owner. It is tempting to suppose that Wat Tyler was a wandering adventurer,³ who had served in the French wars, and now put his military experience at the service of the rebels. His resolute spirit, his daring, the authority which he acquired over his companions, would be adequately explained by this hypothesis. Froissart, moreover, states that Tyler had served as a man-at-arms in France;⁴ and whatever may have been said of his trustworthiness, Froissart, though certainly guilty of much inaccuracy and confusion in his account of these events, had nevertheless collected much precise information, which is often confirmed by official documents.

Such were the beginnings of the rebellion. It arose almost simultaneously in Essex and Kent, on the shores of the Thames, the occasion being the collection of the poll-tax. The irritation felt by so many against the great landholders, the justices, the royal officials, the "traitor" ministers, added to the inflammatory advice of certain daring leaders, transformed a riot of tax-resisters into a revolution. After ten days the flames were blazing in so many places at once that very vigorous action would have been necessary to quench them. But the government seemed paralysed by the failure of the feeble measures it adopted at the beginning of the trouble. The great lords and military commanders who concerning the beginning of the revolt

Conclusions

1. The authorities are printed by Flaherty, loc. cit., pp. 92 sqq., and by Powell and Trevelyan, op. cit., p. 9.

2. "Unus tegulator de Estsex" (Eulogium Historiarum, (R.S.), iii. 352). Cf. Kriehn, op. cit., pp. 459 sqq.

3. The vagueness of the statements as to his origin supports this conjecture. At Smithfield, a "valet" in the king's train declared that Wat Tyler was the greatest thief in Kent, and that he recognised him as such (Chron. anon., ed. Trevelyan, p. 519).

4. Ed. Luce-Raynaud, Soc. Hist., Fr., x. 108.

were then with the king hesitated to call the nobles to arms. Helped by treachery, the rebels had everything their own way for several days.

Thanks to the accounts of the chroniclers, historians have long been familiar with the tragic events which came to pass in London and the neighbourhood from 12 to 15 June:¹ the pillaging of the archbishop's manor at Lambeth and the marshal's at Southwark; the rescue of the prisoners in the King's Bench and the Marshalsea (12 June); the abortive attempt at a meeting between the young king and the rebels at Blackheath;² the entry of the rebel bands into London; the burning of the Savoy, the palace of the duke of Lancaster, and of the property of the Hospitallers, whose prior was the treasurer Hales, one of the "traitors" (13 June); the interview between Richard and the insurgents at Mile End, and his promise to enfranchise all the villeins in the realm; the murder of the archbishop and the treasurer at the Tower, and massacres in the streets of the city (14 June); Wat Tyler's meeting with the king at Smithfield, followed by his death and the dispersion of the rebels (15 June). The documents discovered since Stubbs summarised the history of these events throw no fresh light on the apparent desertion by Richard of the archbishop and the treasurer: and it is still impossible to explain how and why they fell into the hands of the angry mob in a stronghold which was evidently capable of successful defence against the rebels.³ Nor has greater certainty been

1. See my Introduction, pp. lxxx-xcvi; Oman, Great Revolt of 1381, pp. 46 sqq.

2. The Anonymous Chronicle (pp. 513 sq.) confirms most of Froissart's account of this episode, and adds a few details of its own.

3. The author of the Anonymous Chronicle tries to justify the king, but his account clearly shows that when Richard left for Mile End nothing was done to ensure the safety of the Tower. The chronicler says that before setting out, Richard advised the archbishop and those with him to make their escape by the river. Sudbury tried to do so, but the notice of the rebels was drawn by the cries of a woman who recognised him, and he went back to the Tower. Realising that he had no hope of escape "l'archevesque chanta sa messe devotement en la Toure attained regarding the events of 15 June. Notwithstanding Froissart's evidence, it is certain that the interview at Smithfield was desired by the king and his advisers, but the development of the action and the death of Tyler still seem to have been the result of chance.¹ The field thus remains clear for theories.²

et confessa le prior de la Hospitall de Clerkenwell et autres ; et puis oya deux messes ou trois et chanta la Comendacione et Placebo et Dirige et les VII salmes et la latinée et quant il fust a Omnes sancti orate pro nobis, le comens entreront et [traierent] le archevesque hors de sa chapelle en la toure" (ed. Trevelyan, pp. 516-7). The rebels wandered at will through the Tower: "Thomas at Sole, ville de Gravesend, se cognovit esse infra cameram domini regis in Turri Londoniensi in crastino Corporis Christi et cum gladio suo lectum domini regis fincit" (Powell and Trevelyan, op. cit., p. 10).

1. According to the Anonymous Chronicle, the king replied personally to the demands put forward by Wat Tyler, all of which he granted, with a reservation of the rights of the crown. At this stage none of his train dared to speak. Tyler, however, aroused the anger of the king's followers by rinsing his mouth and drinking in the king's presence. As he was remounting his horse a "valet" of Kent who was present cried that he recognised Tyler, who was the greatest thief in the whole of his county. Wat Tyler rode at him to kill him; but Walworth, interposing, exchanged blows with Tyler, and wounded him, while another valet of the king's household, coming to the mayor's aid, cut at him several times with his sword. Tyler spurred his horse and fled; but he soon rolled from his saddle and fell to the ground. Warned by his shouts, the rebels were preparing to help him, when Richard put himself at their head and succeeded in persuading them to follow him. Walworth went to seek reinforcements; and the insurgents were surrounded. Tyler was found in a room of the hospital of St. Bartholomew; Walworth had him carried out into Smithfield, and he was beheaded in the presence of his associates (ed. Trevelyan, pp. 519 sqq.).

2. Mr. Kriehn argues (op. cit., pp. 472 sqq.) that Tyler's death is best explained as one of the political murders "that darken English history." The various precautions taken before the meeting at Smithfield (Richard II's prayers at Westminster; the selection of a place quite close to London; the cuirass worn by Walworth under his cloak), and the speed with which the London loyalists arrived to surround the rebels—these facts, he thinks, show that Tyler's murder was premeditated and that he walked into a trap. It may have been so: but the facts relied upon by Mr. Kriehn can be explained on other grounds.

Mr. Powell thinks that a secret understanding, based on common enmity towards John of Gaunt, existed between Richard and the rebel leaders (Rising in East Anglia, pp. 58 sqq.). This, he says, would explain the readiness with which, on the death of Tyler, "the rebels transferred their allegiance to the king." His language, however, is misleading; for Richard had never ceased to be regarded as king by the insurgents. It is moreover difficult to think that such tortuous schemes could have been planned and carried out by a mere youth. For our part, we are disposed to accept the account of the Anonymous Chronicle, and to assign to chance a large share in the events of the day.

On the other hand, the causes of the temporary success of the movement have been more clearly revealed, and the mental attitude of the insurgents in south-east England can be described with some confidence. If the conduct of the king's supporters remains mysterious and suspicious, the records have now shed a very clear light on that of the rebels and their accomplices.

The judicial documents discovered by Réville establish the complicity with the insurgents of a number of Londoners who played a very active part during the time from 13 to 15 June. "The London mob," says Stubbs, "sympathised with the avowed purposes of the rebels."

Sympathy was felt not only by the mob. At least three aldermen played false to Walworth the mayor. One of them, the fishmonger John Horn, was sent to meet the rebels. They were wavering, and half disposed to go home. Horn's mission was to strengthen this inclination. So far from doing so, however, he urged them to push on to London, where, he said, they would be given a hearty welcome and good cheer; and during the next night he in fact admitted several of the leaders to the city and put them up at his house. Finally, on the 13th, he went to Blackheath displaying a royal standard, and declared to the rebels that in the capital they would find none but friends. They accordingly set out, intending to cross the Thames at London Bridge. The defence of the bridge had been entrusted by the mayor to another alderman, Walter Sybyle; he, however, hindered the citizens from preparing resistance, and when the rebels arrived from Blackheath, let them pass without even a pretence of opposition. A third alderman, William Tonge, flung open Aldgate, on the east of the city, to the bands from Essex. In short, London was delivered to the insurgents by aldermen hostile to the mayor.¹

1. Réville, Document no. 10; cf. Froissart, x. 110. On the subsequent acquittal of the aldermen, see my Introduction, p. lxxxiii, n. 3. Cf. a document printed by Powell and Trevelyan, Peasants' Rising, p. 30.

Once the rebels were inside the walls, Londoners made use of them and directed their movements. John Horn set himself up as redresser of wrongs, and pronounced sentences. It was certainly at the instigation of Londoners that the insurgents destroyed the Savoy and the Hospital.¹ Many victims of the massacres of 14 June must have been pointed out to their murderers by citizens. Thomas Faringdon and his friends had spent the previous night drawing up proscription-lists.² Particular animosity was shown towards those in the service of the duke of Lancaster, who was an object of hatred to a whole party in the city, his surgeon and one of his esquires being slain. A large number of Englishmen and Flemings³ were beheaded in the streets : some of these were considered " traitors," as for instance the financier Richard Lyons ; but very often the sole motive was personal enmity or jealousy of foreign competition. Along with many tragic episodes, the judicial records narrate mean and almost humorous incidents, which are yet very significant ; and we can see Londoners terrorising their creditors, holding worthy citizens to ransom, and, by a turn of the hand, bringing long actions-at-law to a favourable termination.⁴ During this time, as Froissart well puts it, the peasants from Kent and Essex, crowded in the narrow streets, " knew not what they wanted or what they were seeking, but followed one another about like cattle."⁵

1. Réville, Documents, nos. 10 sqq.

2. " Receptit secum noctanter plures principales insurrectores, videlicet Robertum de la Warde et alios, ymaginando illa nocte et cum aliis sociis suis conspirando nomina diversorum civium que fecit scribi in quadam cedula, quos vellet decapitare et eorum tenementa prostrare " (Réville, no. 10, p. 195).

3. That Flemings were murdered is attested by documents of all kinds, and by the Anonymous Chronicle (p. 518), which also mentions the pillaging of the houses of Lombard merchants. [Chaucer's one allusion to the rising concerns the massacre of the Flemings (Nonne Prestes Tale, lines 573 sqq.)]

4. Réville, nos. 10, 32, 33, 34, 36.

5. Froissart, x. 98.

When on 15 June Walworth came from Smithfield to collect reinforcements, Sybyle and Horn strove by spreading false reports to prevent the Londoners from leaving the city.¹ This time, however, they failed: and the citizens, exasperated by the disorder and violence they had witnessed or endured, brought help to the king.

Inhabitants of London, urged by political or private hatred, or merely by self-interest, were therefore largely responsible for the murders and other misdeeds committed in the capital. Without their intervention, it would be impossible to understand the demoralisation of the government during the four days or the violence shown towards foreigners.

But it was not only the Londoners who were bitter against the "traitors." The Anonymous Chronicle shows how widespread was this feeling, by which indeed, at times of disturbance, the popular imagination is nearly always inflamed.

Attitude of the rebels of Kent and Essex

The malcontents of Essex and Kent were convinced that everything would be well if only they could rid the world of John of Gaunt, the archbishop and the treasurer, the bishop of London, and some of the chief officers of finance and justice. From Blackheath they sent a naïve message to the king, demanding the heads of these traitors. Next day the peasants gathered outside the Tower, refusing to move when urged to go to Mile End; and the mob on St. Catherine's wharf declared that they would not go away "before they had the traitors in the Tower": and, as we know, they kept their word. The removal of the "traitors" they associated with the welfare of the king, which they professed themselves anxious to promote. Before entering

Loyalty to Richard

London they had told a messenger from the king that they were coming "for his salvation and the destruction of those who were traitors to him and the realm.”¹ They had as watchword: “With whome haldes you?” and anyone challenged had to reply, on pain of death: “With Kinge Richarde and the true comons.” When they met the king at Mile End, they knelt, protested their loyalty, and forthwith demanded the death of the traitors. At Smithfield, they showed the same respect for the king’s person. Even Tyler seems to have used no threats against Richard himself. At the beginning of the interview, he assumed the demeanour and tone of a demagogue who knew his manners and was anxious to put his sovereign at his ease. He took the young king by the hand and shook it, saying, “Brother, be of good cheer and merry, for within the next fortnight,² you shall have more joy of the commons than ever you had before, and we shall be good comrades.”³

The men of Kent and Essex, however, did not confine themselves to demands for mere personal changes in the government. They wanted large social reforms, and on this head the Anonymous Chronicle gives information which seems worthy of belief.⁴ At Smithfield the rebels declared that they would not go home without a charter of liberties. When asked to explain what his followers wanted, Tyler said that every law except the statute of Winchester must be repealed, that outlawry must be abolished, that villeinage must cease, and that the property of the church must be divided among the people, except what was necessary for the maintenance of the clerks and of a single bishop, one being quite enough for the whole

Tyler's demands

1. The statements of the anonymous chronicler on this attitude of the rebels of the south-east are moreover confirmed by other documents of high authority, notably by John Malvern’s most valuable continuation of the Polychronicon Ranulfi Higden: “Hi quidem de Cantia . . . praetendentes se defensuros regem et regni commoditatem contra suos traditores” (Higden, ed. Lumby (R. S.), ix. 1).

2. Mr. Kriehn (art. cit., p. 471) strangely misinterprets this phrase: quinsane means “fortnight,” and not the tax known as a fifteenth.

3. Anon. Chron., ed. Trevelyan, pp. 513 sqq.

4. Ibid., pp. 519 sqq.; cf. Kriehn, pp. 477 sqq.

country. The rebels thus demanded the abandonment of every measure taken since 1285 for the maintenance of public order and the regulation of labour: above all, it seems, they wanted the Statutes of Labourers repealed. The reason for their objection to outlawry was that this sentence was pronounced on wandering labourers who refused to obey the statutes. The demand, already put forward at Mile End, for the abolition of villeinage was only to be expected, for Tyler was speaking on behalf of peasants, many of whom still laboured under the burdens and humiliations of serfdom. Another chronicler adds that the peasants also claimed liberty to hunt and fish, and this too was very natural. As for the reform of the church, it was urged by religious agitators, and especially by John Ball, who had been with the rebels for several days. According to the anonymous chronicler, Ball preached the very doctrine that Tyler put forward in his speech: there was to be no bishop in England except one archbishop, who should be Ball himself; no religious house might have more than two monks or canons; and ecclesiastical property should be distributed among the laity. "Wherefore," continues the chronicler, "he was held among the commons as a prophet."¹ The charter of liberties which Tyler wished to dictate to the king may therefore be taken as a faithful summary of the hopes which the leaders had excited in the breasts of the insurgents from Essex and Kent.

When the rebels lost their chief and dispersed to their homes, nothing more was heard of this programme of reforms. For some weeks still, the Essex and Kent
after 15 June peasants of Kent and Essex committed robberies, held their enemies to ransom, plundered game-preserves, and burned legal documents: while in Thanet villeins who continued to "do services" were threatened with death.² But all this was mere

1. Chron. Anon., p. 512.

2. Archæologia Cantiana, iii. 71 sqq.; Trans. Essex Archæol. Soc., New Series, i. 218; Réville, nos. 59 sqq.; Powell and Trevelyan, op. cit., pp. 3 sqq.

vulgar lawlessness, and soon ceased in the face of repressive measures.

Notwithstanding the speedy collapse of the ambitious schemes of Wat Tyler, Jack Straw, and John Ball, the rising spread far and wide. Stubbs recognised that it had a wide range: but he lacked the evidence necessary to form an accurate estimate of the extent of the revolt. The documents collected by Réville, however, show that the greater part of the realm was affected.

Middlesex and North Surrey were as profoundly disturbed as Essex and Kent, and supplied some of the bands which invaded London or sacked the suburbs. The Essex rebels, who were particularly daring and enthusiastic, sent emissaries as far as the middle of Surrey, and both in this county and in Sussex, there were risings of the peasants, which occasioned serious disorder, though unfortunately little is known about it. Nearly all the south-western counties—

Berkshire, Hants, Wilts, and Somerset—were influenced sooner or later by the wave of revolution. The towns of Winchester, Salisbury, and Bridgewater witnessed violent disturbances which evidently sprang from local jealousies, though we know that the people of Bridgewater went to seek inspiration in London.¹

In Hertfordshire the revolt broke out on the evening of 13 June, at the news of the success of the rebellion in London; but as Réville has shown, the rising in this county had a distinct character of its own.² The insurgents were almost all peasants, most of them free and many in comfortable circumstances. In Hertfordshire much land was held by

1. Réville, App. II, series A and F. Cf. my Introduction, pp. xcvi sqq., cvii sqq. On the rising in Surrey, see also Powell and Trevelyan, op. cit., p. 17: on that in Sussex, Page, Umwandlung der Frohndienste, p. 41, n. 37.

2. Réville, pp. 3—49.

the church, especially by the powerful abbey of St. Albans, and the tenants were severely treated. The ecclesiastical landlords refused to enfranchise their serfs, to abandon their monopolies, to renounce their privileges of hunting and fishing, and to extend the customary rights of the peasantry. The town of St. Albans had repeatedly demanded certain liberties, but in vain.¹ Stimulated by both the example and the precepts of the rebels of the south-east, the peasants rose in rebellion, but their object was merely to obtain a few specific reforms.

After receiving a message calling on them to take their weapons and join the men of Kent and Essex in London, the inhabitants of St. Albans set out for the capital on the morning of the 14th. In the presence of Jack Straw, they took the oath of obedience to the king and the people, received instructions and promises of aid from Wat Tyler, and obtained from Richard a letter urging Thomas de la Mare, the abbot, to gratify their wishes. They had no thought of demanding the distribution of the abbey lands among themselves. As defined in the charter which the abbot granted them on 16 June, their requests were modest and practical.

In the first place, rights of passage, pasture, hunting and fishing were conceded them. The monopoly of the abbey mill was abolished, and it was agreed that the abbot's bailiff should no longer interfere in the government of the town. With these concessions they declared themselves satisfied. The other tenants of the abbey had assembled from all parts of the county, and they also demanded charters. Thomas de la Mare granted about a score, conceding the enfranchisement of the villeins, rights of hunting and fishing, rights of pasture, and the abolition of certain rents and monopolies. At Dunstable, in the same way, the tenants of the priory made no attempt to assert their independence, but they

Charters granted by the abbey

1. See Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii. 477, n. 1.

Dunstable forced the prior to grant them a charter. Criminal offences were comparatively rare. The peasants of Hertfordshire had listened to the appeals and the advice of the rebels of London and Kent, but on reflection they regarded the whole rising as nothing more than an excellent opportunity for settling old differences with their lords, and they showed folly only in believing, even after the death of Wat Tyler and the dispersion of the rebels at Smithfield, that charters and seals would secure them in the possession of the liberties they had won at so little cost.

The whole of west Hertfordshire had been involved in the rising. The neighbouring counties of Bucks and Beds were also disturbed. Tenants repudiated their services, and furnished recruits to the army of rebels which invaded London. The midlands Oxfordshire, Warwickshire, and Leicestershire, and perhaps even the counties bordering on Wales, did not escape the infection.¹ Even in the Wirral peninsula the serfs of the abbot of Chester rose up against their lord, though this seems to have been an ill-timed and isolated outbreak.² In general, the intensity of the movement declined rapidly as it spread westwards. Towards the north-east, on the other hand, it retained its strength as far as the limits of East Anglia, and stopped only in the distant county of York.

In Cambridgeshire the revolt was general on 15 June. It lasted only four or five days, but was very violent.³ Cambridgeshire The first outbreak was excited by messages from London, brought by a

1. See the documents in Réville, App. II, series E and G; cf. my Introduction, pp. cii, cvi sqq. and notes.

2. We know of this revolt from documents published by Powell and Trevelyan, Peasants' Rising, pp. 13 sqq. According to royal letters of 1 Sept. and a statement of the juries, the abbot's serfs took arms on 29 July in the hundred of Wirral, after the reading of a royal proclamation forbidding assemblies and riots. It is not known if they had already rebelled in the month of June.

3. For the rising in Cambridgeshire and Hunts see Powell, Rising in East Anglia, pp. 41-56; Réville, App. II, series B.

small landholder of Bottisham, John Greyston by name, who had witnessed the murders in the Tower, and by a London saddler, John Staunford, who had lands in the county. Conspicuous among the leaders were two rich landlords, John Hanchach and Geoffrey Cobbe. The rebels copied the exploits of Wat Tyler's followers, burned manorial and royal records and the Poll Tax rolls, drove away lawyers and tax-collectors, and threw open the prisons; but, as in the neighbouring county of Hertford, and for similar reasons, their hatred was principally reserved for the great ecclesiastical proprietors. The peasants were forbidden to pay dues and to perform their services. The houses of the Hospitallers, the monastery of Ely, Barnwell Priory, and Corpus Christi College were entered and plundered. As the burgesses of Cambridge were jealous of the privileges of the University, it had to promise to abandon them. At the same time its archives were in great part destroyed. In Huntingdonshire the wealthy abbey of Ramsey was attacked by rebels from Cambridgeshire and the south, and in Northants the abbot of Peterborough narrowly escaped death at the hands of his tenants. This last county was one where, in recent years, the villeins had formed unions to refuse labour services.¹

Hunts and Northants.

Peculiar conditions in Norfolk and Suffolk

leinage was not unknown; but there were numerous freeholders, many estates held on lease, and even villages without lords. The independence enjoyed by a large section of the peasantry only stimulated feelings of jealousy and irritation towards the wealthy landlords, especially such as were not ready to abandon the ancient

1. For the rebellion in Northants, see my Introduction, pp. xxxix, cvii and the notes.

2. See Réville's account, op. cit., pp. 53—128; also Powell, Rising in East Anglia, pp. 9—40.

methods of cultivation. Among these was the abbot of Bury St. Edmunds, one of the most powerful lords in England, who resolutely maintained the burdens of serfdom on his enormous estates, and refused to grant privileges to the inhabitants of Bury. A large number of people, moreover, were engaged in manufacture, especially in Norfolk. The artisans complained of the execution of the Statutes of Labourers, and chafed at the competition of the Flemish workmen who had come to teach them the textile crafts and had afterwards settled in their midst. The rebels of Suffolk and Norfolk were rural tenants, craftsmen, and small traders. A good many discontented priests, and a few gentlemen with an eye to plunder, like Sir Roger Bacon and Sir Thomas Cornard, threw in their lot with them. They took arms at the instigation of messengers sent by the men of Essex, but it is improbable that they followed instructions from Wat Tyler.¹ Their revolt developed on lines of its own, and had no real connection with any other movement save that in Cambridgeshire. Nevertheless it was very violent.

The East Anglian rising broke out on 12 June on the borders of Suffolk and Essex. On that day a priest fallen on evil times, John Wrawe by name, gathered a band of men and plundered a manor belonging to the financier Richard Lyons, who two days later was to be executed by the rebels in London. The Suffolk insurgents had other leaders, but John Wrawe was the most daring and the most influential. He organised plundering expeditions, which he directed in person or entrusted to lieutenants, and the booty gathered was divided among the rebels. Apparently his sole object was to fill his own pockets.² The chief scene of his exploits was Bury St. Edmunds,

The rising in Suffolk

1. See on this subject the remarks of Réville, op. cit., pp. 61 sqq.

2. See the Declarations of John Wrawe, published in Réville, App. I, pp. 175—182.

Bury
St. Edmunds and the inhabitants, while anxious not to compromise themselves, cunningly urged him on to subvert the authority of the abbey. The abbey was then under the provisional rule of a prior, John of Cambridge, who had done his best to maintain the interests of the house against the townspeople. He and another monk were murdered. The monastery was compelled to grant a charter of liberties to the people of Bury. Another band sought out and seized a high dignitary, Sir John de Cavendish, the chief justice of the King's Bench, whose estates were in Suffolk, and who had been commissioned to superintend the execution of the Statutes of Labourers. Cavendish was beheaded.

As early as 14 June the south of Norfolk had been infected by the revolt. Three days later the whole county was involved. It was one of those which suffered most severely.

The rising in Norfolk In the western part of Norfolk the innumerable misdeeds revealed by judicial documents were in general only acts of pillage or revenge, perpetrated by bands or by isolated individuals. So great was the panic they created, that the rebels were allowed to drive off the cattle,

Uncontrolled pillage in
West Norfolk carry away money and food, and dismantle houses. At Lynn they hunted out the Flemings and put them to death. Except in two cases, however, there was in this district no attack on manorial rights. In east Norfolk, on the other hand, the revolt took the form of a social war, conducted with a definite plan of campaign by one daring leader.

A dyer of Felmingham, Geoffrey Listere, succeeded in securing his recognition as "king of the commons" by all the rebels of this region.

Social war in East Norfolk. He created a war-chest by setting apart a proportion of the plunder and by levying

Geoffrey Listere "customs." His aim was to overthrow all existing authority and to abolish all privileges. Tax-rolls and title-deeds were burnt; lawyers were held to ransom, or even set in the pillory and executed; the nobles were forced, on pain of death, to follow the "king of the commons" and obey him. The charter of privileges possessed by Yarmouth market was torn up, and several Flemings were executed to please the English craftsmen. For some ten days Norfolk was turned upside down.

The agitation spread from there into Lincolnshire, and even into Yorkshire.¹ On 23 June, at the news of what had been happening "in the regions of Yorkshire the south," a revolutionary government was set up in the remote town of Scarborough. The royal officers were driven away, and the property of the rich was seized. Beverley² and York³ had long been in a disturbed state, and it is difficult to decide how far the disorders which broke out in these towns during July should be regarded as a result of the great rising. According to the juries, however, the hostility of the parties who were contending for the municipal government of York revived at the news of the rising in the south, and the central authority asserted the existence of a link between the troubles in this town and the "diabolical revolt in Kent and Essex."⁴

Though the rising was disconnected, though its leaders were of mediocre ability, we see that it spread from its birth-place in the south-east far towards the Scottish and Welsh borders without meeting any serious obstacle. A kind of bewilderment had paralysed the king's council and all those whose class interests were imperilled. The monks did little but bemoan their fate. The men of Huntingdon, who shut their gates against the rebels, were regarded as heroes; elsewhere people allowed themselves

1. See the documents in Réville, App. II, series C and D.; C. T. Flower, Beverley Town Riots (Trans. Royal Hist. Soc., New Series, vol. xix, pp. 91 sqq.).

2. See Mr. Flower's account, loc. cit., pp. 79 sqq.

3. Cf. Stubbs, Const. Hist., ed. 1903, vol. iii, chap. 21, sect. 488.

4. Réville, Documents nos. 152 and 180.

to be robbed, except those who tried to gain some advantage from the general disorder. The high-born set the example of cowardice, though Sir Robert Salle, who lost his life for protesting against the crimes of the Norfolk mob, must be excluded from this reproach. But in all parts men of gentle blood submitted to be led about by the rebels, joined in their demands, and obeyed their leaders.

It was only on the death of Wat Tyler that courage returned to the king's advisers. Helped by the mayor and the loyal aldermen of London, the veteran Robert Knolles and the other military leaders with the king at last succeeded in organising resistance, their efforts being seconded in another sphere by lawyers like Bealknap and Tressilian.¹ From 18 June onward the chancery despatched letters to the royal officials for the re-establishment of peace in the disturbed counties. The disturbance had been so profound that order could not be restored as quickly as it had disappeared, and up to the month of November the outlook remained troubled. Nevertheless at the end of June it was already clear that the government had the upper hand.

Military measures were necessary in Essex and Kent. The peasants, though defeated, continued to demand liberties, and in the month of October they again tried to kindle a general insurrection.² In Suffolk, William of Ufford, who had formerly fled in disguise, had his revenge, and undertook the pacification of the county from which he

1. For what follows see the documents in Réville, especially series G; cf. his account of the suppression of the revolt in Herts., Suffolk, and Norfolk, pp. 129—172. The repressive measures of the government have received general treatment in my Introduction, pp. cxii—cxxviii, to which the reader may be referred.

2. See the documents published by W. E. Flaherty, Sequel to the Great Rebellion in Kent of 1381 (Archæologia Cantiana, iv. (1861), pp. 67—86).

derived his title. The warlike bishop of Norwich, Henry Despenser, marched with an armed force through Northants, Hunts, Cambridgeshire, and Norfolk, and fought a regular battle with the insurgents at North Walsham. In every county the local gentry took their vengeance for the fright they had been given; but there was little slaughter, and the summary execution of Jack Straw has few parallels, even in the cases of very conspicuous leaders.¹ Legal proceedings were everywhere instituted. In a writ issued immediately after his return from Smithfield on

•
The bishop of Norwich

The forms of law observed

15 June, the king ordered that the guilty should be proceeded against according to the ordinary forms of law. If we remember the barbarous brutality with which the Jacquerie had been punished in France twenty-three years before, this respect for law and legal forms will appear highly to the credit of mediæval England.

The attitude of the courts was on the whole reasonable and impartial. With the aid of juries of presentment and petty juries, both civil and criminal cases were investigated and tried by commissions which included, on the one hand, the sheriffs and the justices, with Tressilian at their head, and, on the other, persons who had taken the lead in resisting the rebels, like Walworth and Robert Knolles, together with several great lords, like John of Gaunt and the earls of Buckingham, Kent, and Oxford, whose interest it was to display their loyalty. The government kept an attentive eye on the proceedings, for the impartiality of the juries was not above suspicion. It modified certain sentences and sometimes granted pardons. On 12 September the commissioners charged with the investigation of thefts of movable goods were recalled for abusing their powers. Finally, by a series of writs issued in August

Attitude of the
government

1. Cf. Rot. Parl., iii. 175, no. 1. Even John Ball was formally tried; see Réville, p. 150.

and September, the king suspended the prosecutions and called all cases before the King's Bench.

Parliament, which met in November, and again in January, 1382, was of the opinion that a general amnesty ought to be granted, though it excepted two hundred and eighty-seven offenders. The amnesty was conceded, but the royal officers often disregarded its terms. Certain leaders, though excluded from the amnesty and even condemned by juries, were released. Others, who should have been protected by the general pardon which parliament had obtained, were prosecuted or obliged to buy letters of protection. The pleasure of the king, therefore, determined the fate of many.

All things considered, however, we must repeat that the measures of repression were mild. If the victims on both sides be counted, the revolt, according to Stubbs, may have cost the lives of seven thousand persons¹—a figure derived from the chroniclers. Official records furnish scarcely a hundred and ten names of rebels who were hanged or beheaded. This number is evidently below the truth, but cannot be very far from it. There is clear proof that many who were guilty of most serious offences escaped the penalty of death.

On the other hand, the royal council and the parliaments which met after the revolt, were unanimous in their desire to annul all the acts of the rebels and all the concessions which they had obtained.² Apart from damage which could not be repaired, they would leave no trace of the violent effort which the lower classes had made to gain greater independence. Such was the will of king and parliament alike.

Was this intention realised? Rogers asserts that it was not. In his opinion, the victory, though apparently

1. Const. Hist., ii, 482, and n. 5.

2. Ibid., ii. 482 sqq.

Mistaken view of Rogers

it had fallen to the king and the nobles, really remained with the peasants, and the social war of 1381 had as a result the virtual extinction of villeinage.¹ This view was accepted by Stubbs. But the records prove that the events of 1381 caused no change in the condition of the peasants.² Serfdom continued on the manors where it previously existed. The problem of wages remained

The
old problems remain

as before, and the workmen of the towns, like those of the country, complained of the same evils. The insurrection had only one appreciable result: it had let loose popular passions which retained their violence for many years. The labourers had gained nothing by the revolt; but they drew from it a more bitter consciousness of their grievances. They continued to combine for the increase of wages and the repudiation of services. Every now and then, bands would be formed to burn records, plunder

Leagues and risings of the villeins

mansions, threaten the justices, or break into prisons; and there was continual fear of the renewal of a general rising.³ This profound unsettlement of society increased the influence of revolutionary ideas, and the spread of the Lollard heresy was greatly helped through the envy excited by the wealth of the clergy. The desire for the division of ecclesiastical property was now fixed in the popular mind. On the other hand, the great shock of 1381 had inspired those whose privileges were threatened

1. Rogers, Hist. of Agric., i. 8, 26, 89 sqq., 476 sqq., iv. 4 sqq., 71, 92.

2. See my Introduction, pp. cxxvii and cxxix sqq.; cf. Feiling, Essex Manor (Eng. Hist. Rev., 1911), pp. 334, 336. According to this scholar, the great changes in the manor of Hutton took place between 1424 and 1470. On the real causes of the disappearance of villeinage, see especially E. P. Cheyney, Disappearance of English Serfdom (Eng. Hist. Rev., 1900), pp. 25 sqq.

3. Besides the examples which are cited in my Introduction, pp. cxxx sqq., see a document concerning a rising of the villeins of the bishop of Bath and Wells in Somerset in 1398 (Powell and Trevelyan, Peasants' Rising, pp. 21-23).

with new energy in their defence. During the whole of the following period the reaction was as vigorous as the previous attack. The anxiety to check the current of revolution appears even in the repressive policy adopted against the Lollards. They were persecuted chiefly because they were regarded as instigators of social unrest. The events of 1381, therefore, left profound marks on men's minds. It was long before the privileged classes forgot the fear which they had felt, long before the people forgot their lost opportunity of winning a little more prosperity.

The conclusions which we have just sketched may one day be stated more fully, perhaps modified, although they are based on a solid foundation of evidence. Whether the investigation of records will reveal new details concerning the little-known movements which took place, for instance, in the midlands, it is impossible to say : but it is certain that much may still be learned as to the causes, the nature, and the results of the rising by a thorough examination of the judicial documents of the second half of the fourteenth century ; for this great task is by no means accomplished. Such researches cannot fail to give much satisfaction to those who undertake them, if the rebellion of 1381 is not only, as Stubbs says, "one of the most portentous phenomena in the whole of English history," but also, as I believe, one of the most significant and most interesting events in the whole history of the middle ages.

INDEX.

- Agisters, agistment, 159-160, 197.
Aids, regulated by the Great Charter, 101-102, 127, 141, 142; see Auxilium.
Alodium, 52.
Anglo-Saxon and Norman institutions, divergences between, 66.
Armies, Anglo-Saxon, 58; Norman, 59 sqq.
Articles of the Barons in 1215, 117, 118, 143, 184, 190, 195.
Assart, 157, 190.
Assize, of Clarendon, 194.
 of Woodstock, 175 sqq., 180 sqq., 192 sqq., 212, 233, 236.
 of Edward I concerning the Forest, 206, 208, 240.
Attachment, court of, 160-161.
Auxilium burgorum, 98, 102, 153.
- Ball, John, 278, 284, 292 sqq.
Barnwell, priory of, 296.
Barons, the, their origin, 53-4; meaning of the word in the 11th century, 61 note 1; the barons and the Great Charter, 129 sqq.
Barony, nature of a, 63.
Bealknap, Robert, 300.
Bede, alleged allusion to Folkland by, 33.
Berkshire, rising of 1381 in, 293.
Beverley, 299.
Blackheath, 286, 288, 290.
Bookland, 31.
Borough, employment of the word, 71; impossibility of defining it exactly, 68 sqq.
Boroughs, the heterogeneous, 79; the homogeneous, 80; "garrison theory" of origin of heterogeneous, 78.
Breteuil, influence of customs of, in England, 88.
Bridgewater, 272 n., 293.
Britons, see Celts.
Bruges, a typical castle-formed town, 77 note 1.
Burgage, tenure in, 58, 70.

Burgenses, 79, 80, 81.

Burh-bot, 80.

Burh-geat-setl, 39 sqq.

Burhs, meaning of the term, 70, 74, 75, 77-8.

Bury St. Edmunds, 274, 297.

Cambray, example of conspiratio, 94-5.

Cambridgeshire, rising of 1381 in, 295 sqq.

Capitalis forestarius, the, 158, 190.

Capitularies on the Carolingian Forest, 166.

Carucage, 141.

Castles, origin of certain towns, 76.

Cavendish, John, chief-justice of the King's Bench, 298.

Celts, Celtic elements in the origins of the manor, 10 sqq.

Ceorl, 7, 14, 24.

Charles I, king of England, 244, 250.

Charles VI, king of France, 248.

Charter, the Great, an appeal to Civil War, 144; compared with the Unknown Charter, 123 sqq.; confirmations of, text of the, 142; interpretation of the, 127; its reactionary character, 129; its "sentimental force," 128; description of, in "Histoire des ducs de Normandie," 131 sqq.; unmentioned by biographer of William the Marshal, 134; described by Wendover, Coggeshall, Barnwell, 134-5; new light on, 131; reaction in modern criticism of, 128; reasons of its constitutional importance, 144, 184 sqq., 195, 198.

see also Confirmatio Cartarum.

of Liberties, the alleged Unknown, 116.

of the Forest, 187 sqq., 220 sqq., 227 sqq., 236.

Chase, right of the, 153 sqq., 177 sqq., 187 sqq., 211, 237, 245 sqq. in the sense of "Forest," 151, 154.

Cinque Ports, 86-7.

Civil War, appeal to, in the Great Charter, 144.

Civitas, meaning of the word in the Middle Ages, 70 and note 4.

Clergy, clauses concerning the, in the Great Charter, 136.

forest offences of the, 182 sqq., 200.

their connection with the rising of 1381, 270 sqq.

Cnihten-gild, 78, 91.

Cnihts, 78, 80.

Commendation, 15, 20.

Commons, the, their attitude towards disafforestation, 212.

Commune concilium regni, 125, 127, 138 note 1.

- Commune, the French, 94; of London, 96.
 Companies, the Great, 274.
Confirmatio Cartarum, the, 207 sqq., 219.
 Conquest, the Norman, effects of, 167 sqq.
Constabularia, 62-3.
 Council, the royal, attitude towards disafforestation, 229 sqq.
 Customary rights in the Forest, 197, 204.
- Danegeld, 102.
 Danelaw, the, 106 and note 1.
 Danish invasions, result of the, 16.
 Debts of minors to Jews, 123.
 "Defiance," feudal, 113.
 Demesne, royal, in Anglo-Saxon period, 32, 35.
Diffidatio, 113.
 Disafforestation, 197 sqq., 209 sqq.
 Dogs, lawing of, 189.
 Domesday Book, boroughs mentioned in, 72, 79; complexity of the society which it describes, 19-20; difficulties of interpretation, 18-19.
Donum, 102 note 2, 104.
 Dower and dowry, 123.
Drengs, 16.
 Dubbing, see Knighthood.
 Dunstable, priory of, 294.
 Dunwich, the burgesses of, 81, 82.
- Edward the Confessor, his treasure, 46; his great officers, 49-50.
 Edward I, his policy regarding the Forest, 204 sqq.; his resistance to demands for disafforestation, 216 sqq.; results of his policy, 229 sqq.; his treatment of disafforested lands, 235; attempt to revoke his perambulations, 245.
 Edward II, 227 sqq., 236.
 Edward III, the Forest under his rule, 231 sqq., 241 sqq., 243 sqq., 246.
 Ely, abbey of, in 1381, 296.
 Essex, rising of 1381 in, 280 n., 281 sqq., 288, 290 sqq., 297, 300.
Etablissements de Rouen, 97 and note 2.
Ethel, 32.
 Exchequer, arithmetic of, 47-48; Black Book of the, 62; Dialogue of the 45-49; Norman, 49; Red Book of the, 62.
 Expropriation of the Anglo-Saxon owners by the Normans, 21-23.

- Family land, 14 note 2, 31 sqq.
- Faringdon, Thomas, 282 sqq., 289.
- Farm of the counties, 45.
- Feudalism, germs of, amongst the Anglo-Saxons, 15, 16, 58 sqq., 63 sqq.; its introduction into England by the Normans, 21 sqq., 59 sqq.; its character in England, 52 sqq.
- Feudal Custom in Great Charter, 136.
- Feudal Law, no distinct, in England, 53.
- Feudum*, feodum, meaning of the word in English documents, 52.
- Firma burgi*, 70, 85-6.
- Firma comitatus*, see Farm.
- Firma unius noctis*, 85.
- Flemings, murdered in 1381, 270, 289, 297.
- Folkland, its real meaning, 29 sqq.
- Folkmoot* of London, 94, 100 note 2.
- Foreign service, 125.
- Foreigners, unpopularity of, in 1381, 270, 289 n.
- Forest, the, meaning of the term, 149 sqq.; organisation of, 156 sqq.; offences against, 157, 164, 166, 173, 175 sqq., 181 sqq., 188 sqq., 191 sqq., 240 sqq.; officials of, 158 sqq.; courts of, 160 sqq., 190, 227; extent of, 163 sqq.; origin of, 166 sqq.; in Normandy, 166 sqq.; under the Norman kings, 167 sqq.; under the Angevins, 179 sqq.; its abolition attempted in 1215, 184 sqq.; under Henry III, 199 sqq., 212 sqq.; under Edward I, 205 sqq., 217 sqq.; under Edward II, 227; its financial value, 210 sqq.; its decline, 239 sqq.; in France, 166 sqq., 177, 195 sqq., 209 sqq., 249 sqq.
- of Bernwood, 158 n. 3; of Braden, 236; of Brewood, 213; in Cornwall, 213; of Dean, 157 n., 159 n., 162 n., 202 n., 210 n., 230 n.; in Devon, 213, 225 n., 230 n.; in Essex, 151, 164, 171 n., 180 n., 213, 239 n.; of Exmoor, 151 n., 218 sqq.; in Hunts., 199 n., 221; of Inglewood, 210 n.; in Lancashire, 215 n., 246 n.; in Leicestershire, 170 n., 190 n., 215 n., 217 n.; of Mendip, 219; in Middlesex, 217 n.; of Neroche, 219; the New Forest (Hampshire), 168 sqq., (Staffordshire), 213; in Northants., 215 n., 221; in Northumberland, 219; in Oxfordshire, 221; of Pickering, 246; of Rockingham, 151 n.; in Rutland, 170 n., 190 n., 200, 203, 215 n., 221, 243 sqq.; of Selwood, 219; of Sherwood, 205 n., 240 n.; in Shropshire, 213, 215 n.; in Somerset, 159, 172, 204, 206, 217 sqq.; in Staffordshire, 213, 215 n.; in Surrey, 213, 221, 231 n.; in Sussex, 217 n.; of Waltham, 171 n.; in Warwickshire, 223; of Windsor, 173 n.; in Worcestershire, 215 n.; in Yorkshire, 215 n.

Forest Law, in the "Unknown Charter," and in the Great Charter, 124-5, 133.

Foresters, various classes of, 158 sqq., their relation to the forest courts, 160 sqq., 163; powers of, 164, 180 n., 201, 223; in the Frankish forests, 166; under Henry I, 173; under Henry II, 181 sqq.; in Magna Carta, 185 sqq.; abuses of, 196 sqq., 200, 203 sqq., 209, 227, 228, 240 sqq., 245sqq.

Forstallatio, 234.

France, the right of the chase in, 166 sqq., 177 sqq., 195 sqq., 209 sqq., 237 sqq., 248 sqq.

Frankalmoin, tenure in, 56.

Franks, reciprocal influence of their civilization and that of the Anglo-Saxons, 42 sqq.

Freeholders, 2, 24-25.

Gafol, 85.

Game-laws, origin of the, 245 sqq.

Gaveston, Piers, 227

Geneats, 16.

Gerefa, port-gerefa, 83.

Germanists (theories) on the origin of the manor, 3-4; on the origin of military tenure, 58 sqq., 64 sqq.

Gilds, the cnihten-gild, 78, 80; political importance of the, 84.

Hales, Robert, treasurer in 1381, 275, 282, 286.

Haws, belonging to outside manors, in boroughs, 79.

Henry I., charter of, 116-17, 168 sqq., 191 sqq.; the so-called "Leges" of, 172 sqq.

Henry II. and London, 95; his Assize of Woodstock, 175 sqq., 180 sqq., 192, 233; growth of the Forest under, 179 sqq.; his relations with the clergy, 182 sqq.; his treatment of forest offences, 192; disafforestation of his additions to the Forest, 198, 216; possible beginnings of the Purlieu under, 233 sqq.

Henry III. and London, 104; his first re-issue of the Great Charter, 186; his Charter of the Forest, 187 sqq., 214 sqq.; state of the Forest under, 199 sqq.; disafforestation under, 213 sqq.

Henry V, 244 n., 248.

Henry VIII, 249 sqq.

Heriot, in existence in pre-Conquest times, 66.

Hertfordshire, no Forest in, 164, 174.

rising of 1381 in, 293 sqq.

Hide, new conclusions on the, 14, 16; the hide and the compurgatory oath, 37 note 1; the holding of five hides and the rank of thegn, 59 note 1.

Horn, John, alderman of London in 1381, 288 sqq.

Hospital, order of the, 286, 289, 296.

Huntingdonshire, rising of 1381 in, 296, 299.

Husting of London, 94, 99.

Hynden, meaning of, 36, 38.

Inheritances, 123.

Innocent III., his letter to John Lackland in 1203, 112-13; his letter to the Norman bishops in 1205, 114.

Inquest of 1166, 62.

Inquest of knights sworn to execute the Great Charter, 124.

Inquisitions into forest offences, 162 sqq., 174, 196, 199 sqq., 202, 243 sqq.

Islip, Simon, archbishop of Canterbury, 272.

Itinerant Judges, 137.

James I, 245, 250.

John, King, 184 sqq., 187 sqq., 213, 224, 235.

John Lackland, his two trials, 107; and London, 100 sqq., 137-8.

John of Gaunt, 255, 275, 287 n., 289 sqq., 301.

Jurats of Cinque Ports, 86.

Justice, restraint of abuse of royal rights of, in Great Charter, 137; rights of, of feudal lords, 133.

Justices of the Forest, 158, 161, 162 sqq., 174, 190, 204, 208, 220, 223, 241.

Justiciar of London, 92 note 3.

Kent, rising of 1381 in, 283 sqq., 290 sqq., 294 sqq., 300.

Kighthood, the ceremony of dubbing to, 42.

Knights, the class of, 54.

Knight's Fee, see Tenure.

Knight Service, see Tenure.

Knolles, Robert, 273, 300 sqq.

Lagemen of Lincoln, 85.

Langland, William, 262, 269, 277.

- Law Merchant, the, 138.
- Leg, John, 279 sqq.
- Leicestershire, see Forest; rising of 1381 in, 295.
- Levingmen*, 56 note 3
- Libër homo*, meaning of the expression in England, 54; in the Great Charter, 139
- Liberi homines*, 128; scope of term, 139-40.
- Liberties, municipal, 71.
- Listere, Geoffrey, 298 sqq.
- Lollards, the, 276, 303 sqq.
- Lombards, attacked in 1381, 270, 289 n.
- London, its origin, 72 note 2; constitution of, under the Norman kings, 92 sqq.; Charter of Henry I. for, 91; the "communio" of 1141, 94; Stephen and London, 95; Henry II. and London, 95; the commune of London in 1191, 96 sqq.; Richard I. and London, 99-100; London and the Great Charter, 101 sqq.; the Nine Articles of 1215, 100; London and the Petition of the Barons, 102; John Lackland and London, 100, 137-8; Henry III and London, 104; mayor of London, 96-100; justiciars of London, 92 note 3; aldermen of London, 98-99; port-reeve of London, 92; status of London, 106; Mr. Round's parallel between London and Rouen, 97; London and Middlesex, farm of, 92.
- hunting-rights of the inhabitants, 171 n.
- the revolt of 1381 in, 268 sqq., 282 sqq., 286 sqq.
- Louis XI, king of France, 250.
- Lyons, Richard, 289, 297.
- Magnum Concilium*, see Commune Concilium regni.
- Maintenance, 273.
- Manor, origin of the, 3 sqq.; Celtic elements in, 10; Roman elements in, 12-13; Anglo-Saxon elements in, 13; Norman elements in, 21 sqq., 27-28; Mr. Maitland's theory on the, 18 note 2; its development under the Norman Kings, 21 sqq.; the manor at the end of the Middle Ages, 1-3; the manor and the boroughs, 79 sqq.; changes in, during the 14th century, 256 sqq.
- Mare, Thomas de la, abbot of St. Albans, 294.
- Mark System, 4 sqq.
- Markets, creation of, 84.
- Marriage, feudal right of, 55 note 5, 123, 133.
- Measures, Weights and, 138.
- Mediate tenants, 140.

Merchants, privileges of the, in the Great Charter, 138-9; in the rising of 1381, 270. See Law Merchant.

Merchetum, 24 note 3, 69 note 2.

Middlesex, its relation to London, 91 sqq.

Mile End, 286, 290 sqq.

Mortimer, family of, foresters-in-fee in Somerset, 159.

Mortimer, Roger, policy in 1327, 231.

Mural houses, 80.

Mynster-stowe, 76.

Neville, Peter de, 203.

Nobility, character of the, in England, 53 sqq.; their privileged position, 126

Norfolk, rising of 1381 in, 296 sqq.

Norman Conquest, effects of, on the English rural classes, 21-23, 27-28; on the central financial organisation, 45 sqq.; on military service, 62; on municipal growth, 86-89; its special contribution to English history, 66.

Northants., rising of 1381 in, 296.

Northern Barons and the "Unknown Charter of Liberties," 119.

Oath, compurgatory, 36.

Officers of Edward the Confessor, 46, 50-51.

Open Field, the, 2, 6, 11, 12, 13.

Ordinances of 1311, 228.

Oxfordshire, rising of 1381 in, 295.

Papacy, the, its possible connection with rising of 1381, 272 n.; see also Clement V.

Parks, 151 sqq., 154 sqq.

Parliament, its attitude towards disafforestation, 212, 229, 232; protests against forest abuses, 227 sqq., 236, 240, 224; initiates the game-laws, 246 sqq.; its attitude towards social unrest in the 14th century, 263 sqq.; its view of the causes of the rising of 1381, 280; its attitude after the rising, 302.

of 1258 (Oxford), 215, 217; of 1299, 221; of 1300, 221 sqq.; of 1301 (Lincoln), 224 sqq.; of 1380, 279.

Perambulation of the forests, 214 sqq., 218 sqq., 228 sqq., 245.

Peterborough, abbot of, 211, 296.

Philip Augustus, his agent, 122.

Pipe, Rolls of the, 51 note 1, 91.

Pleas, Common, 137 note 2.

Poll-tax, the, of 1380, 279 sqq.

Port, 83.

Port-reeve, 83, 92.

Probi homines, 96, 99.

Purlieu, the, 233 sqq.

Purpresture, 157, 176, 189, 242.

Purveyance, abuses of, 137.

Radknights, 16.

Ralph of Coggeshall, chronicle of, 111, 134-5.

Ramsey abbey, 296.

Rangers, the, 233, 236.

Regard, regards, the, 160 sqq., 173, 233.

Reliefs, 55 note 5, 123, 133.

Revenue, ordinary, of king, 141.

Richard I, 177, 183 sqq., 192 sqq., 198, 212.

Richard II, his measures regarding the Forest and the right of the chase, 241 sqq., 247 sqq.; during the rising of 1381, 286 sqq., 290 sqq., 302.

Roman occupation, 12 sqq.

Romanists (theories) on the origin of the manor, 5 sqq.; on the origin of the towns, 73-4.

Rouen, no affiliation between London and, 98.

Runnymede assembly, composition of the, 135.

Sac and Soc, 15, 84, 85.

St. Albans, 274, 294.

Salisbury, 268, 272n., 293.

Salle, Robert, 300.

Scaccarium, see Exchequer.

Scarborough, 299.

Scutage, 56 note 1, 121-2, 125, 141, 142.

Serjeanty, 57.

Servitium debitum, 62.

Sheriff of London, 91, 92.

Sheriffs, Inquest of, under Henry II, 181.

Silchester, 73.

Sixhynd, 38.

- Slavery, persistence of, at the time of the Norman Conquest, 21; its disappearance, 24.
- Smithfield, 286 sqq., 291 sqq.
- Socage, tenure in, 24-25.
- Sochemanni*, see Sokemen.
- Sokemen, 6, 20, 23, 25.
- Solidarity, family, 36 sqq.
- Statute of Labourers, 264 sqq., 271 sqq., 283, 292.
of Winchester, 291.
- Stephen, King, 170, 179, 215.
- Straw, Jack, 284, 293, 294, 301.
- Sudbury, Simon, archbishop of Canterbury, 272, 275, 283, 286 and n., 290.
- Suffolk, rising of 1381 in, 296 sqq.
- Surrey, rising of 1381 in, 293.
- Sussex, rising of 1381 in, 293.
- Swanimote*, the, 160, 190 sqq., 204, 241, 244.
- Sybyle, Walter, alderman of London in 1381, 288, 290.
- Tallage, 102 sqq.
- Tallies, 48.
- Taxation and the Great Charter, 141-2, see Aid, auxilium, donum, scutage, tallage.
- Tenant-in-chief, 61.
- Tenure, by knight service, origin of, 58 sqq.; free, 56 sqq.; in chivalry, 56; its origin, 56, 63; Norman theory of, 23 sqq., 55; servile, 23; see Burgage, frankalmoin, manor, socage, villeinage.
- Tenures, origin of English, 58.
- Thegns, 6, 15, 59, 64, 65; form a military and landed aristocracy, 16; king's, 65.
- Theow*, see Slavery.
- Tonge, William, alderman of London in 1381, 288.
- Towns, English county, 78; continental influence in, after the Norman Conquest, 86; formation of the, 75 sqq.; garrison theory, 78; importance of trade, 76, 82, 83; influence of the monasteries on the formation of, 76; liberties of the, 71; market, 69; original features of, 90; resemblance to those of the continent, 84 sqq.; rural character of, 75; the towns and the Great Charter, 137-8; urban colonisation after the Conquest, 89; urban institutions, 89; French, diversity in, 67; Roman, in England, 72; Roman, after the Anglo-Saxon invasion, 74-5; survival of, in Gaul, 74. position of, after the Black Death, 268 sqq.

Township, 27-8.

Treasurer, origin of office of, 46.

Tressilian, Robert, 300 sqq.

Trinoda necessitas, 80.

Tūn, 6.

Tunesman, 20.

Tungerefa, see Gerefa.

Twelfhynde and Twyhynde, 16, 36 sqq.

Tyler, Wat, 246 sqq., 284 sqq., 291 sqq., 294 sqq., 297, 300.

Undersette, 55.

Undertenants, in Great Charter, 140.

Vassallus, 52.

Verderers, the, 160.

Vere, Robert de, earl of Oxford, 301.

Villa, 68, 69.

Village community, 2-3, 26-7, 75, see Mark, Township.

Villeinage, in Domesday, 20; in the thirteenth century, 24.

Villeins, origin of the, 3 sqq.; wainage of the, protected by the Great Charter, 139; made foresters by Henry II, 181; their grievances in the 14th century, 256 sqq.; their efforts to improve their position, 263; their attitude in the rising of 1381, 277 sqq., 281, 286, 291 sqq.; effects of the rising on, 303.

Virgate, 17.

Wainage, see Villeins.

Walworth, William, mayor of London, 282, 287 notes, 288, 290, 300 sqq.

Wardship, right of, 55, 123.

Warrens, the king's, 152 sqq., 185, 226; of the lords, 155, 199, 235, 246 sqq.; in France, 249 sqq.

Warwickshire, rising of 1381 in, 295.

Waste, offence of, 157, 161, 190.

Weigher (of Exchequer), 46.

Weights and Measures in the Great Charter, 138.

Wergild, importance of, in the Anglo-Saxon period, 36 sqq.

William the Conqueror fixes number of knights' fees furnished by each barony, 58.

William I, 167 sqq., 175, 179, 191.

William II, 168 sqq., 172, 179, 192.

- Winchelsea, Robert, archbishop of Canterbury, 207, 223.
Winchester, rising of 1381 in, 293.
Wirral, the, rising of 1381 in, 295.
Witenagemot, 31 sqq.
Woodwards, the, 159.
Woodstock, see Assize.
Wrawe, John, 297 sqq.
Wycliffe, John, 262, 276 sqq., 282.
- Yarmouth, 274, 299.
York, 268, 299.
Yrfelana, 32.

Publications of the University of Manchester

A LIST OF BOOKS PUBLISHED BY THE MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY PRESS

AT THE UNIVERSITY PRESS
12 LIME GROVE, OXFORD ROAD, MANCHESTER
LONGMANS, GREEN & COMPANY
39 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.4
FOURTH AVENUE AND THIRTIETH STREET, NEW YORK PRAIRIE AVENUE AND TWENTY-FIFTH STREET, CHICAGO
BOMBAY, CALCUTTA, MADRAS

ANATOMICAL SERIES

- No. I. STUDIES IN ANATOMY from the Anatomical Department of the University. Vol. III. Edited by the late Professor A. H. YOUNG, M.B., F.R.C.S. Twenty-three Plates. 10s. net.

ARCHITECTURAL SERIES

- No. I. THE HALL I' TH' WOOD, BOLTON, LANCASHIRE. A portfolio of Measured Drawings, with a descriptive notice. Four Plates. 3s. net.

- No. II. MANCHESTER SCHOOL OF ARCHITECTURE SKETCH BOOK.

No. I. : THE OLD TOWN HALL, MANCHESTER. Containing Nineteen Plates, size 13 by 19½, 10s. 6d. net ; or in portfolio, 12s. 6d. net.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL SERIES

- No. I. THE CATALOGUE OF THE CHRISTIE COLLECTION. Compiled under the direction of C. W. E. LEIGH, M.A. £1 : 1s. net ; 50 copies on hand-made paper, bound in half-morocco, £2 : 2s. net.

BIOLOGICAL SERIES

- No. I. THE HOUSE FLY. Musca domestica (Linnæus). By C. GORDON HEWITT, D.Sc. [Out of print.]

- No. II. THE QUANTITATIVE METHOD IN BIOLOGY. By the late Professor JULIUS MACLEOD, D.Sc. Illustrated. 15s. net.

CELTIC SERIES

- No. I. AN INTRODUCTION TO EARLY WELSH. By the late Professor J. STRACHAN, LL.D. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

- No. II. THE LANGUAGE OF THE ANNAIS OF ULSTER. By Professor TOMAS Ó MAÍLLE, M.A. 7s. 6d. net.

- No. III. A GLOSSARY OF MEDIÆVAL WELSH LAW BASED UPON THE BLACK BOOK OF CHIRK. By T. LEWIS, M.A. 15s. net.

CLASSICAL SERIES

- No. I. THE RIDDLE OF THE BACCHAE. The Last Stage of Euripides' Religious Views. By Professor G. NORWOOD, M.A. 6s. net.

- No. II. THE AUTHORSHIP OF THE PLATONIC EPISTLES. By R. HACKFORTH, M.A. 6s. net.

- No. III. THE LAWS OF PLATO. The Text, edited by E. B. ENGLAND, M.A., Litt.D. [In the Press.]

COMPARATIVE LITERATURE SERIES

- No. I. CASTELVETRO'S THEORY OF POETRY. By H. B. CHARLTON, M.A. 5s. net.

ECONOMIC SERIES

- No. I. THE LANCASHIRE COTTON INDUSTRY. A Study in Economic Development. By S. J. CHAPMAN, C.B.E., M.A. 7s. 6d. net.
- No. II. COTTON SPINNING AND MANUFACTURING IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. By T. W. UTTLEY, B.A. 2s. net.
- No. III. SOME MODERN CONDITIONS AND RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN IRON AND STEEL PRODUCTION IN AMERICA. By F. POPPLEWELL, B.Sc. 2s. net.
- No. IV. ENGINEERING IN THE UNITED STATES. By F. FOSTER, M.Sc. 2s. net.
- No. V. THE RATING OF LAND VALUES. By J. D. CHORLTON, M.Sc. 3s. 6d. net.
- No. VI. THE DYEING INDUSTRY. By S. H. HIGGINS, M.Sc. 8s. 6d. net. Third Edition.
- No. VII. THE HOUSING PROBLEM IN ENGLAND. Its Statistics, Legislation and Policy. By Professor E. R. DEWSNUP, M.A. 5s. net.
- No. VIII. AMERICAN BUSINESS ENTERPRISE. A Study in Industrial Organisation. By D. KNOOP, M.A. 2s. 6d. net.
- No. IX. THE ARGENTINE AS A MARKET. By N. L. WATSON, M.A. 1s. 6d. net.
- No. X. SOME ELECTRO-CHEMICAL CENTRES. By J. N. PRING, D.Sc. 2s. 6d. net.
- No. XI. CHEMICAL INDUSTRY ON THE CONTINENT. By H. BARON, B.Sc. 2s. 6d. net.
- No. XII. UNEMPLOYMENT IN LANCASHIRE. By S. J. CHAPMAN, C.B.E., M.A., and Professor H. M. HALLSWORTH, M.A., B.Sc. Paper covers, 3s. 6d. net.
- No. XIII. THE COTTON INDUSTRY IN SWITZERLAND, VORARLBERG AND ITALY. By S. L. BESSO, LL.B. 3s. 6d. net.
- No. XIV. THE GERMAN COTTON INDUSTRY. By R. M. R. DEHN, B.A. 2s. net.

EDUCATIONAL SERIES

- No. I. CONTINUATION SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND AND ELSEWHERE. Their Place in the Educational System of an Industrial and Commercial State. By Sir MICHAEL E. SADLER, C.B., M.A., LL.D., Vice-Chancellor of the University of Leeds. 8s. 6d. net.
- No. II. THE DEMONSTRATION SCHOOLS RECORD. No. I. Edited by Professor J. J. FINDLAY, M.A., Ph.D. 2s. 6d. net.
- No. III. THE TEACHING OF HISTORY IN GIRLS' SCHOOLS IN NORTH AND CENTRAL GERMANY. A Report by EVA DODGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. net.
- No. IV. THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION IN THE UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER. 1890-1911. With Twelve Illustrations. Paper covers, 2s. net; cloth, 3s. net.
- No. V. OUTLINES OF EDUCATION COURSES IN MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY. 8vo, 3s. net.
- No. VI. THE STORY OF THE MANCHESTER HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, 1871-1911. By SARA A. BURSTALL, M.A., Headmistress. With Eighteen Illustrations. 5s. net.
- No. VII. THE DEMONSTRATION SCHOOL RECORD.
No. II.: THE PURSUITS OF THE FIELDEN SCHOOL. Edited by Professor J. J. FINDLAY, M.A., Ph.D. With Eight Illustrations. 5s. net.
- No. VIII. MANCHESTER AND THE MOVEMENT FOR NATIONAL ELEMENTARY EDUCATION, 1800-1870. By S. E. MALTBY, M.A., M.Ed. 10s. 6d. net.
- No. IX. THE CHILD VISION. Being a study in Mental Development and Expression. By DOROTHY TUDOR OWEN, B.A., M.Ed. [In the Press.]

ENGLISH SERIES

- No. I. THE LITERARY PROFESSION IN THE ELIZABETHAN AGE. By PHCEBE SHEAVYN, M.A., D.Litt. 6s. net.
- No. II. BEOWULF. Edited by Professor W. J. SEDGEFIELD, Litt.D. 9s. net. Second Edition.
- No. III. PATIENCE: A West Midland Poem of the Fourteenth Century. Edited by HARTLEY BATESON, B.A. 5s. net, Second Edition.

ENGLISH SERIES—continued

- No. IV. THE EARLY LIFE OF GEORGE ELIOT. By MARY H. DEAKIN, M.A. 6s. net.
- Nos. V. and VI. THE POETICAL WORKS OF WILLIAM DRUMMOND OF HAWTHORNDEN. With "A Cypress Grove." Edited by Professor L. E. KASTNER, M.A. Two vols. Twenty-nine Plates. 21s. net.
- No. VII. THE PLACE NAMES OF CUMBERLAND AND WEST-MORLAND. By Professor W. J. SEDGEFIELD, Litt.D. 10s. 6d. net.
- No. VIII. THOMAS HARDY. A Study of the Wessex Novels. By H. C. DUFFIN, M.A. [Second Edition in Preparation.
- No. IX. THE LIFE AND WORKS OF ARTHUR HALL OF GRANTHAM, Member of Parliament, Courtier, and first Translator of Homer into English. By Professor H. G. WRIGHT, M.A. 10s. 6d. net.
- Nos. X. and XI. THE POETICAL WORKS OF SIR WILLIAM ALEXANDER, EARL OF STIRLING. Edited by Professor L. E. KASTNER, M.A., and H. B. CHARLTON, M.A. [In the Press.

ETHNOLOGICAL SERIES

- No. I. THE MIGRATIONS OF EARLY CULTURE. By Professor G. ELLIOT SMITH, M.A., M.D., F.R.S. 7s. 6d. net.
- No. II. SHELLS AS EVIDENCE OF THE MIGRATIONS OF EARLY CULTURE. By J. W. JACKSON, F.G.S. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
- No. III. THE MEGALITHIC CULTURE OF INDONESIA. By W. J. PERRY, B.A. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

FRENCH SERIES

- No. I. LES ŒUVRES DE GUIOT DE PROVINS. Éditées par Professor JOHN ORR, M.A. 10s. 6d. net.
- No. II. ŒUVRES POÉTIQUES DE JEAN DE LINGENDES. Publiée par E. T. GRIFFITHS, M.A. 6s. net.
- No. III. THE TEACHING OF FRENCH IN ENGLAND DURING TUDOR AND STUART TIMES. By KATHLEEN LAMBLEY, M.A. [In the Press.

FRENCH SERIES FOR SCHOOLS

- MOLIÈRE. L'AVARE. Edited by Professor A. T. BAKER, M.A., Ph.D. 3s. net.
- SELECTED LETTERS OF MADAME DE SÉVIGNÉ. Edited by Professor A. T. BAKER, M.A., Ph.D. 3s. 6d. net.
- CORNEILLE. LE CID. Edited by J. MARKS, M.A. 3s. 6d. net.
- VICTOR HUGO. SELECTIONS FROM THE POETRY OF. Edited by Professor A. T. BAKER. [In the Press.
- FOURNIER, A. LE GRAND MEAULNE. Edited by J. G. ANDERSON, B.A. [In the Press.

Etc., Etc., Etc.

GERMANIC SERIES

- No. I. VOWEL ALLITERATION IN THE OLD GERMANIC LANGUAGES. By E. CLASSEN, M.A., Ph.D. 3s. 6d. net.

6 MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY PRESS

HISTORICAL SERIES

- No. I. MEDIÆVAL MANCHESTER AND THE BEGINNINGS OF LANCASHIRE. By Professor JAMES TAIT, M.A. Three Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
- No. II. INITIA OPERUM LATINORUM QUAE SAECULIS XIII., XIV., XV. ATTRIBUUNTUR. By A. G. LITTLE, M.A. [Out of print.]
- No. III. THE OLD COLONIAL SYSTEM. By G. B. HURST, M.A., M.P. 6s. net.
- No. IV. STUDIES OF ROMAN IMPERIALISM. By W. T. ARNOLD, M.A. Edited by E. FIDDES, M.A. With Memoir of the Author by Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD and C. E. MONTAGUE. 7s. 6d. net.
* * The Memoir may be had separately, 2s. 6d. net.
- No. V. CANON PIETRO CASOLA'S PILGRIMAGE TO JERUSALEM IN THE YEAR 1494. By M. MARGARET NEWETT, B.A. Three Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
- No. VI. HISTORICAL ESSAYS. Published in Commemoration of the Jubilee of the Owens College, Manchester. Edited by Professors T. F. TOUT, M.A., F.B.A., and JAMES TAIT, M.A. 7s. 6d. net.

Contents

- THE BEGINNINGS OF CÆSAR-WORSHIP. By E. FIDDES, M.A.
- THE LEGEND OF ST. URSULA AND THE ELEVEN THOUSAND VIRGINS. By Mrs. T. F. TOUT, M.A.
- THE RULE OF ST. AUGUSTINE. By ELIZABETH SPEAKMAN, M.A.
- WALES AND THE MARCH DURING THE BARONS' WARS, 1258-1267. By T. F. TOUT, M.A., F.B.A.
- THE ITALIAN BANKERS IN ENGLAND AND THEIR LOANS TO EDWARD I. AND EDWARD II. By W. E. RHODES, M.A.
- PIERRE DUBOIS: A MEDIÆVAL RADICAL. By F. M. POWICKE, M.A.
- DID RICHARD II. MURDER THE DUKE OF GLOUCESTER? By JAMES TAIT, M.A.
- THE BOROUGH OF PRESTON AND ITS GILD MERCHANT. By H. W. CLEMESHA, M.A.
- THE SUMPTUARY LAWS OF VENICE IN THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH CENTURIES. By M. MARGARET NEWETT, B.A.
- SOME ASPECTS OF HENRY VIII.'S IRISH POLICY. By R. DUNLOP, M.A.
- SEBASTIAN GRYPHIUS, PRINTER. By R. C. CHRISTIE, LL.D., M.A.
- ELISABETH, PRINCESS PALATINE. By Sir A. W. WARD, Litt.D.
- THE MILTONIC IDEAL. By G. A. WOOD, B.A.
- THE SIEGE OF MANCHESTER IN 1642. By E. BROXAP, M.A.
- THE BEGINNINGS OF THE NATIONAL DEBT. By W. A. SHAW, Litt.D.
- THE MORAVIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE EVANGELICAL REVIVAL IN ENGLAND, 1742-1755. By the Rev. J. E. HUTTON, M.A.
- NAPOLÉON: THE FIRST PHASE. By H. SPENSER WILKINSON, M.A.
- THE DETENTION OF NAPOLÉON AT ST. HELENA. By J. HOLLAND ROSE, M.A., Litt.D.
- HISTORICAL TEACHING IN SECONDARY SCHOOLS. By Mrs. A. HAWORTH, M.A.
- HISTORICAL TEACHING UNDER THE ENGLISH SYSTEM OF ELEMENTARY EDUCATION. By T. BATESON, M.A.

HISTORICAL SERIES—continued

- No. VII. STUDIES AND NOTES SUPPLEMENTARY TO STUBBS' CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY. Vol. I. By C. PETIT-DUTAILLIS, Litt.D. Translated by W. E. RHODES, M.A., and edited by Professor JAMES TAIT, M.A. 5s. net.
- No. VIII. MALARIA AND GREEK HISTORY. By W. H. S. JONES, M.A. With the History of Greek Therapeutics and Malaria Theory by E. T. WITHINGTON, M.A., M.B. 6s. net.
- No. IX. THE HISTORY OF GRUFFYDD AP CYNAN. With Translation, Introduction, and Notes by ARTHUR JONES, M.A. Three Illustrations. 6s. net.
- No. X. THE GREAT CIVIL WAR IN LANCASHIRE, 1642-1651. By E. BROXAP, M.A. Map and Six Plates. 7s. 6d. net.
- No. XI. A BIOGRAPHY OF THOMAS DEACON, THE MANCHESTER NON-JUROR. By H. BROXAP, M.A. Two Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
- No. XII. THE EJECTED OF 1662: Their Predecessors and Successors in Cumberland and Westmorland. By B. NIGHTINGALE, M.A., Litt.D. Two vols. 28s. net.
- No. XIII. GERMANY IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. A series of lectures with Prefatory Note by Professor T. F. TOUT, M.A., F.B.A. 3s. 6d. net.

Contents

- THE POLITICAL HISTORY. By Professor J. HOLLAND ROSE Litt.D.
 THE INTELLECTUAL AND LITERARY HISTORY. By Professor C. H. HERFORD, Litt.D.
 THE ECONOMIC HISTORY. By Professor E. C. K. GONNER, M.A.
 THE HISTORY OF EDUCATION. By Sir MICHAEL E. SADLER, M.A., LL.D., C.B.
- No. XIV. A HISTORY OF PRESTON IN AMOUNDERNESS. By H. W. CLEMESHA, M.A. With Five Maps. 7s. 6d. net.
- No. XV. A SHORT HISTORY OF TODMORDEN. By J. HOLDEN, M.A. Twenty-five Illustrations. Cloth, 2s. net; Cloth Extra, 2s. 6d. net.
- No. XVI. THE LOSS OF NORMANDY, 1189-1204. By Professor F. M. POWICKE, M.A. With Six Maps. 15s. net.
- Nos. XVII. and XVIII. IRELAND UNDER THE COMMONWEALTH: Being a Selection of Documents relating to the Government of Ireland from 1651 to 1659. Edited by R. DUNLOP, M.A. Two vols. 25s. net.
- No. XIX. THE NAVAL MUTINIES OF 1797. By C. GILL, M.A. Two Maps. 10s. 6d. net.
- No. XX. CHRONICA JOHANNIS DE READING ET ANONYMI CANTUARIENSIS, 1346-1367. Edited by Professor JAMES TAIT, M.A. 10s. 6d. net.
- No. XXI. THE PLACE OF THE REIGN OF EDWARD II. IN ENGLISH HISTORY. By Professor T. F. TOUT, M.A., F.B.A. 10s. 6d. net.
- No. XXII. STUDIES AND NOTES SUPPLEMENTARY TO STUBBS' CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY. Vol. II. By C. PETIT-DUTAILLIS, Litt.D. Translated by W. T. WAUGH, M.A., and edited by Professor JAMES TAIT, M.A. 5s. net.

HISTORICAL SERIES—continued.

No. XXIII. STUDIES AND NOTES SUPPLEMENTARY TO STUBBS' CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY. Consisting of Nos. VII. and XXII. of the Historical Series in one vol. 9s. net.

No. XXIV. GERMANY IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. A Second Series of Lectures with Prefatory Note by Professor T. F. TOUT, M.A., F.B.A. 3s. 6d. net.

Contents

THE HISTORY OF THEOLOGY. By Professor A. S. PEAKE, D.D.
THE HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY. By BERNARD BOSANQUET, LL.D., F.B.A.

THE HISTORY OF MUSIC. By F. BONAVIA.

No. XXV. GERMANY IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.
Nos. XIII. and XXIV. of the Series in one vol. [Out of print.]

No. XXVI. THE INCENDIUM AMORIS OF RICHARD ROLLE OF HAMPOLE. Edited by MARGARET DEANESLY, M.A. 10s. 6d. net.

No. XXVII. BELGIAN DEMOCRACY: ITS EARLY HISTORY. Being a translation of "Les Anciennes Démocraties des Pays Bas." By Professor H. PIRENNE. Translated by J. V. SAUNDERS, M.A. 4s. 6d. net.

No. XXVIII. THE MAKING OF BRITISH INDIA, 1756-1858. By Professor RAMSAY MUIR, M.A. 7s. 6d. net.

No. XXIX. STUDIES IN ENGLISH FRANCISCAN HISTORY. By A. G. LITTLE, M.A. 10s. 6d. net.

No. XXX. FREEDOM AFTER EJECTION, 1690-1692. By Rev. A. GORDON, M.A. 15s. net.

No. XXXI. THE CHARTIST MOVEMENT. By MARK HOVELL, M.A. Edited and completed with a Memoir by Professor T. F. TOUT, M.A., F.B.A. 7s. 6d. net.

No. XXXII. FINANCE AND TRADE UNDER EDWARD III. BY MEMBERS OF THE HISTORY SCHOOL. Edited by Professor G. UNWIN, M.A. 15s. net.

Contents

THE ESTATE OF MERCHANTS, 1336-1365.
SOCIAL EVOLUTION IN MEDIÆVAL LONDON. } By G. UNWIN, LONDON TRADESMEN AND THEIR CREDITORS. } M.A.

THE LONDON LAY SUBSIDY OF 1332. By MARGARET CURTIS, M.A.

THE SOCIETIES OF THE BARDI AND THE PERUZZI AND THEIR DEALINGS WITH EDWARD III., 1327-1345. By E. RUSSELL, M.A.

THE TAXATION OF WOOL, 1327-1348. By F. R. BARNES, M.A.
THE WINE TRADE WITH GASCONY. By FRANK SARGEANT, M.A.
CALAIS UNDER EDWARD III. By DOROTHY GREAVES, M.A.

No. XXXIII. THE METHODIST UNITARIAN MOVEMENT. Illustrated. By Rev. H. M'LACHLAN, M.A. 4s. 6d. net.

Nos. XXXIV. and XXXV. CHAPTERS IN THE ADMINISTRATIVE HISTORY OF MEDIÆVAL ENGLAND: The Wardrobe, the Chamber, and the Small Seals. By Professor T. F. TOUT, M.A., F.B.A.

[Volumes I. and II. in the Press.]

No. XXXVI. THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE COTTON INDUSTRY: With Some Unpublished Letters of Thomas Crompton. By G. W. DANIELS, M.A., B.Com. [In the Press.]

LECTURE SERIES

- No. I. GARDEN CITIES (Warburton Lecture). By the late Mr. JUSTICE NEVILLE. 6d. net.
- No. II. THE BANK OF ENGLAND AND THE STATE. By Sir FELIX SCHUSTER. [Out of print.]
- No. III. BEARING AND IMPORTANCE OF COMMERCIAL TREATIES IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY. By Sir THOMAS BARCLAY. 6d. net.
- No. IV. THE SCIENCE OF LANGUAGE AND THE STUDY OF THE GREEK TESTAMENT. By the late J. H. MOULTON, M.A., Litt.D. 6d. net.
- No. V. THE GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL: ITS POWERS AND ITS WORK. By Sir D. MACALISTER, M.D., D.C.L. 6d. net.
- No. VI. THE CONTRASTS IN DANTE. By the Hon. W. W. VERNON, M.A. 6d. net.
- No. VII. THE PRESERVATION OF PLACES OF INTEREST OR BEAUTY. By Sir ROBERT HUNTER. 6d. net.
- No. VIII. ON THE LIGHT THROWN BY RECENT INVESTIGATIONS ON ELECTRICITY ON THE RELATION BETWEEN MATTER AND ETHER (Adamson Lecture). By Sir J. J. THOMSON, O.M., D.Sc., F.R.S. 6d. net.
- No. IX. HOSPITALS, MEDICAL SCIENCE AND PUBLIC HEALTH. By Sir CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, K.C.B., M.D. 6d. net.
- No. X. ENGLISH POETRY AND GERMAN PHILOSOPHY IN THE AGE OF WORDSWORTH (Adamson Lecture). By A. C. BRADLEY, Litt.D. 1s. net.
- No. XI. THE EVOLUTION OF SURGERY. By Professor W. THORBURN, M.D., F.R.C.S. 6d. net.
- No. XII. LEIBNIZ AS A POLITICIAN (Adamson Lecture). By Sir A. W. WARD, Litt.D., F.B.A. 6d. net.
- Nos. XIII. and XIV. OLD TOWNS AND NEW NEEDS. By PAUL WATERHOUSE, M.A., F.R.I.B.A., and THE TOWN EXTENSION PLAN, by RAYMOND UNWIN, F.R.I.B.A. (Warburton Lectures). Illustrated. 1s. net.
- No. XV. UNIVERSITY EDUCATION FOR WOMEN. By Mrs. HENRY SIDGWICK, Litt.D. 6d. net.
- No. XVI. THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN MIND AND ITS OBJECTS (Adamson Lecture). By BERNARD BOSANQUET, D.C.L., F.B.A. 1s. 6d. net.
- No. XVII. EDUCATION AS THE TRAINING OF PERSONALITY. An Inaugural Lecture. By Professor H. BOMPAS SMITH, M.A. 6d. net.
- No. XVIII. HOUSING (Warburton Lectures). By B. SEEBOHM ROWNTREE and Professor A. C. PIGOU, M.A. 1s. 6d. net.
- No. XIX. FOUNDER'S DAY IN WAR TIME. By Sir A. W. WARD, Litt.D., F.B.A. 1s. 6d. net.
- No. XX. LEARNERS AS LEADERS. By Professor H. SPENSER WILKINSON, M.A. 1s. 6d. net.
- No. XXI. MODERN METHODS IN THE TREATMENT OF NERVOUS AND MENTAL DISORDERS. By BERNARD HART, M.D. Boards, 1s. net.; cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

MEDICAL SERIES

- NO. I. SKETCHES OF THE LIVES AND WORK OF THE HONORARY MEDICAL STAFF OF THE MANCHESTER INFIRMARY. From 1752 to 1830. By E. M. BROCKBANK, M.D., M.R.C.P. Twenty-nine Illustrations. 15s. net.
- NO. III. HANDBOOK OF SURGICAL ANATOMY. By G. A. WRIGHT, B.A., M.B., F.R.C.S., and C. H. PRESTON, M.D., F.R.C.S., L.D.S. 5s. net.
- NO. IV. COURSE OF INSTRUCTION IN OPERATIVE SURGERY. By Professor W. THORBURN, M.D., F.R.C.S. Twenty-six Figures. 2s. 6d. net.
- NO. V. A HANDBOOK OF LEGAL MEDICINE. By the late Professor W. SELLERS, M.D. Seven Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
- NO. VI. CATALOGUE OF THE PATHOLOGICAL MUSEUM OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER. Edited by Professor J. LORRAIN SMITH, M.A., M.D. 7s. 6d. net.
- NO. VII. TEXT-BOOK ON DISEASES OF THE HEART. By GRAHAM STEELL, M.D., F.R.C.P. One hundred Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
- NO. VIII. DRESCHFELD MEMORIAL VOLUME. Forty-four Plates. 10s. 6d. net.
- NO. IX. A PRACTICAL TEXT-BOOK ON INFECTIOUS DISEASES. By R. W. MARSDEN, M.D., M.R.C.P. 5s. net.
- NO. X. LECTURES ON THE PATHOLOGY OF CANCER. By C. POWELL WHITE, M.D., F.R.C.S. Thirty-three Plates. 3s. 6d. net.
- NO. XI. SEMMELWEIS: HIS LIFE AND HIS DOCTRINE. By the late Sir W. J. SINCLAIR, M.A., M.D. Two Plates. 7s. 6d. net.
- NO. XII. MODERN PROBLEMS IN PSYCHIATRY. By E. LUGARO. Translated by D. ORR, M.D., and R. G. ROWS, M.D. Foreword by the late Sir T. S. CLOUSTON, M.D. Eight Plates. 3s. 6d. net.
- NO. XIII. FEEBLE-MINDEDNESS IN CHILDREN OF SCHOOL AGE. By C. PAGET LAPAGE, M.D., M.R.C.P. [Second Edition in Preparation.]
- NO. XIV. DISEASES OF THE NERVOUS SYSTEM. By JUDSON S. BURY, M.D., F.R.C.P. Two hundred and sixteen Illustrations. 15s. net.
- NO. XV. THE CLINICAL ANATOMY OF THE GASTRO-INTESTINAL TRACT. By Professor T. WINGATE TODD, M.B., Ch.B., F.R.C.S. Thirty-two Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
- NO. XVI. ON BONEFORMATION. By Dr. MURK JANSEN. With Fifty-one Plates. [In the Press.]

MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY PRESS 11

MODERN LANGUAGE TEXTS

FRENCH SERIES

ROUSSEAU. DU CONTRAT SOCIAL. Edited by Emeritus Professor
C. E. VAUGHAN, M.A. 5s. net.

ALFRED DE VIGNY. POÈMES CHOISIS. Edited by E. ALLISON PEERS, M.A. 3s. 6d. net.

PASCAL. LETTRES PROVINCIALES. Edited by H. F. STEWART, D.D. 8s. 6d. net.

Also an edition de luxe on hand-made paper. 21s. net.

B. CONSTANT. ADOLPHE. Edited by Professor G. RUDLER, D.-es-L.
7s. 6d. net.

Also an edition de luxe on hand-made paper. 21s. net.

LE MYSTÈRE D'ADAM. Edited by Professor PAUL STUDER, M.A., D.Litt. 4s. 6d. net.

AUCASSIN ET NICOLETE. (Third edition.) Edited by F. W.
BOURDILLON, M.A. 4s. 6d. net.

A. DUMAS père. HENRI III. Edited by J. G. ANDERSON, B.A.
[In Preparation.]

J. MICHELET. JEANNE D'ARC. Edited by Professor G. RUDLER, D.-es-L. [In Preparation.]

PAUL-LOUIS COURIER. A SELECTION FROM THE WORKS.
Edited by Professor E. WEEKLEY, M.A. [In the Press.]

P. CORNILLE. LA GALERIE DU PALAIS. Edited by Professor
T. B. RUDMOSE-BROWN, M.A. [In the Press.]

E. VERHAEREN. SELECTIONS FROM THE WORKS. Edited by Dr. F. POLDERMANN. [In Preparation.]

ENGLISH SERIES

EDWARD YOUNG. CONJECTURES ON ORIGINAL COMPOSITION. Edited by Professor EDITH J. MORLEY. 4s. 6d. net.

THE ANGLO-SAXON CHRONICLE. Edited by E. CLASSEN, M.A., Ph.D. [In the Press.]

WARTON'S ESSAY ON POPE. Edited by Professor EDITH J.
MORLEY. [In the Press.]

GERMAN SERIES

GOETHE. TORQUATO TASSO. Edited by Professor J. G. ROBERTSON, M.A., Ph.D. 5s. net.

HEINE. BUCH DER LIEDER. Edited by JOHN LEES, M.A., Ph.D.
[In the Press.]

12 MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY PRESS

PHYSICAL SERIES

NO. I. THE PHYSICAL LABORATORIES OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER. A Record of Twenty-five Years' Work (1881 to 1906). Fifteen Plates. 5s. net.

NO. II. LABORATORY EXERCISES IN PHYSICAL CHEMISTRY. By J. N. PRING, D.Sc. Twenty-seven Diagrams. 4s. net.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERIES

NO. I. ARCHIVES OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH LABORATORY OF THE UNIVERSITY, Vol. I. Edited by Professor A. SHERIDAN DELÉPINE, M.Sc., M.B., Ch.M. £1 : 1s. net.

THEOLOGICAL SERIES

NO. I. INAUGURAL LECTURES delivered during the Session 1904-1905. By the Members of the Faculty of Theology. Edited by Professor A. S. PEAKE, M.A., B.D. 2s. 6d. net.

NO. II. THE ARIAN MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND. By Rev. J. HAY COLLIGAN, M.A. 3s. 6d. net.

NO. III. ST. LUKE : THE MAN AND HIS WORK. By Rev. H. M'LACHLAN, M.A. [In the Press.]

NO. IV. A SHORT HISTORY OF THE DOCTRINE OF THE ATONEMENT. By Rev. L. W. GRENSTED, M.A. [In the Press.]

WORKS RELATING TO THE UNIVERSITY

THE UNIVERSITY CALENDAR. Published annually in October.
5s. net.

THE OWENS COLLEGE, ITS FOUNDATION AND ITS GROWTH AND ITS CONNECTION WITH THE VICTORIA UNIVERSITY. By
● JOSEPH THOMPSON. Seven Illustrations. 18s. net.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER MEDICAL SCHOOL.
Seventeen Illustrations. 6d. net.

THE UNIVERSITY DIARY. Published annually in October.
1s. 6d. net.

THE UNIVERSITY: an Impression. Being a reproduction of a three-colour drawing by H. G. S. DELÉPINE. 6d. net.

LIST OF PAST AND PRESENT MEMBERS OF THE UNIVER-SITY SERVING WITH H.M. FORCES IN THE WAR. Second edition corrected to March 1917. 6d. net.

ADDRESS PRESENTED TO THE UNIVERSITY OF LOUVAIN
BY THE UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER. Written by Professors
R. S. CONWAY, Litt.D., F.B.A., and W. B. ANDERSON, M.A., D.Lit. 6d. net.

A SELECTION OF VERSES FROM THE UNIVERSITY MAGA-ZINE, 1868 to 1912. Edited by H. B. CHARLTON, M.A., and O. C. DE C.
ELLIS, B.Sc., with a Preface by Sir ALFRED HOPKINSON. 4s. 6d. net.

THE REGISTER OF GRADUATES OF THE UNIVERSITY UP
TO JULY 1908. Paper, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

EXAMINATION PAPERS SET FOR THE VARIOUS DE-GREES AND SCHOLARSHIPS OF THE UNIVERSITY FOR THE FOLLOWING YEARS:—

SCHOLARSHIPS AND PRIZES, 1912, 13, 14, 15, 19. 9d. net.

FACULTIES OF LAW, MUSIC AND THEOLOGY, 1912, 13, 14, 15, 19. 9d. net.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, 1912, 13, 18, 19. 9d. net.

FACULTIES OF ARTS AND COMMERCE, 1912, 13, 14, 15, 19. 1s. 6d. net.

FACULTY OF EDUCATION, 1912, 13, 14, 15, 19. 6d. net.

FACULTY OF MEDICINE, 1919. 1s. net.

FACULTY OF SCIENCE, 1915, 19. 1s. net.

FACULTY OF TECHNOLOGY, 1913, 14, 15, 19. 1s. net.

FACULTIES OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, 1912. 1s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS PUBLICATIONS

BOTANY

PLANTS IN HEALTH AND DISEASE. An Abstract of a Course of Lectures to Allotment Holders. By Professor F. E. WEISS, D.Sc., Dr. A. D. IMMS, and W. ROBINSON, M.Sc. 1s. 6d. net.

A POCKET SYNOPSIS OF THE FAMILIES OF BRITISH FLOWERING PLANTS: Based upon the System of Engler. By W. B. GROVE, M.A. 1s. net.

EDUCATION

SOUND AND SYMBOL. An Outline of a Scheme of Instruction, Introductory to School Courses in Modern Languages, Shorthand, etc. By Professor J. J. FINDLAY, M.A., with W. H. BRUFORD, M.A. 1s. net.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM. An Address by the Right Hon. H. A. L. FISHER, M.P. 2d. net.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE

SELECTIONS FROM THE OLD ENGLISH BEDE. By Professor W. J. SEDGEFIELD. 3s. 6d. net.

A SKELETON OUTLINE OF OLD ENGLISH ACCIDENCE. Reprinted from the above. 1s. 3d. net.

ETHNOLOGY

SHIPS AS EVIDENCE OF THE MIGRATIONS OF EARLY CULTURE. By Professor G. ELLIOT SMITH. 1s. net.

FRENCH LITERATURE

AUCASSIN AND NICOLETTE. An old French Love Story. The French Version, with English Translation, Notes, etc., etc. By F. W. BOURDILLON, M.A. 3s. 6d. net. Second Edition. See also Modern Language Texts, page 11.

GREEK VASES

A HANDBOOK OF GREEK VASE PAINTING. By MARY A. B. HERFORD, M.A. Illustrated. 9s. 6d. net.

A CATALOGUE OF GREEK VASES PRESERVED IN MANCHESTER. By MARY A. B. HERFORD, M.A. Illustrated. [In Preparation.]

HEBREW

MATERIALS FOR THE STUDY OF HEBREW COMPOSITION. Adapted and arranged by Professor M. A. CANNEY, M.A. 1s. net.

UNPOINTED TEXTS

THE BOOK OF RUTH. 9d. net. Second Edition.

THE BOOK OF AMOS. 6d. net.

THE BOOK OF JUDGES. 1s. net.

THE SECOND BOOK OF KINGS. Cap. 15-Cap. 17. 4d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS PUBLICATIONS—continued

INDUSTRY

INDUSTRIAL ADMINISTRATION. A Series of Lectures in one volume on :— [In the Press.

EDUCATION AS A FUNCTION OF MANAGEMENT. By A. E. BERRIMAN, O.B.E.

THE FACTORY MANAGER AFTER THE WAR. By A. D. DENNING, M.Sc., M.A., Ph.D.

ATMOSPHERIC CONDITIONS AND EFFICIENCY. By Professor LEONARD HILL, F.R.S.

THE APPLICATIONS OF PSYCHOLOGY TO INDUSTRY. By Professor T. H. PEAR, M.A., B.Sc.

SOCIAL OBLIGATIONS OF INDUSTRY TO LABOUR. By B. SEEBOHM ROWNTREE, J.P.

Etc., Etc., Etc.

MANCHESTER

MANCHESTER IN 1915. Edited by H. M. McKECHNIE. Fifteen Illustrations. Paper, 1s. net; cloth, with the Plates mounted, 2s. 6d. net.

MEDICINE

MANCHESTER BABIES' HOSPITAL, MEDICAL REGISTRAR'S MONTHLY REPORTS. Paper covers :—

August 1915 to July 1916. 1s. net.

August 1916 to July 1917. 3s. 6d. net.

SHELL SHOCK AND ITS LESSONS. By Professors G. ELLIOT SMITH, M.D., F.R.S., and T. H. PEAR, M.A., B.Sc. 3s. 6d. net. Second Impression of the Second Edition. Cheap edition in paper covers, 1s. 6d. net.

PHONETICS

A COLLOQUIAL SINHALESE READER. In Phonetic Transcription, by DANIEL JONES, M.A., and H. S. PERERA, B.A. 4s. 6d. net.

A PHONETIC READER FOR USE IN JUNIOR CLASSES. By CATHERINE F. MACKENZIE, M.A., and PHILIPPA W. DREW. 1s. 3d. net.

RUSSIAN

RUSSIAN COMMERCIAL CORRESPONDENCE. By A. S. MINDEL, B.Com. 3s. 6d. net.

A. S. PUSHKIN. EVGENII ONIEGIN. 3s. 6d. net. Russian Texts Series.

THE WAR

BRITAIN'S CASE AGAINST GERMANY. An Examination of the Historical Background of the German Action in 1914. By Professor RAMSAY MUIR, M.A. Paper, 2s. net; cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

WITH MANCHESTERS IN THE EAST. By Major G. B. HURST, M.A., M.P. Illustrated. 2s. 6d. net.

THE EFFECT OF WAR UPON ART AND LITERATURE. By LAWRENCE HAWARD, M.A. 3d. net.

16 MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY PRESS

MAGAZINES, PERIODICALS, ETC.

THE LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE NATURALIST

A Monthly Journal of Natural History and Microscopy. Edited by W. M. TATTERSALL, D.Sc. Annual subscription, 8s. 6d. Single copies, 9d. net.

THE FRENCH QUARTERLY

A Review giving an adequate and Impartial Survey of the different aspects of French Intellectual Activities from the modern point of view. Published four times every year. Editors: Professors G. RUDLER and A. TERRACHER.
Annual subscription, 10s. 6d. net. Single numbers, 3s. net each. Vol. I. is now in course of publication, Nos. 1, 2, 3 having been already issued.

JOURNAL OF THE MANCHESTER, EGYPTIAN AND ORIENTAL SOCIETY

A Journal containing articles regarding the languages, literatures, history and archæology of Egypt and the Orient; also the annual report of the Society. It is published in annual volumes during November of each year at the price of 5s. net per volume. The following numbers have been issued, or are in the press:—

1911 (as the Journal of the Manchester Oriental Society)
1912-13	1913-14	1914-15	1915-16
1916-17	1917-18	1918-19

THE JOHN RYLANDS LIBRARY

CATALOGUES OF BOOKS AND MANUSCRIPTS IN THE LIBRARY

BOOKS PRINTED IN ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND, AND OF BOOKS IN ENGLISH PRINTED ABROAD, TO THE END OF THE YEAR 1640. (1895.) 10s. 6d. net.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE IN THE LIBRARY, 1525 to 1640. With Sixty-five Plates. In levant Morocco. (1899.) £5 : 5s. net.

THE COPTIC MANUSCRIPTS. By W. E. CRUM. (1909.) Twelve Plates. £1 : 1s. net.

THE DEMOTIC PAPYRI. With Plates. By F. LL. GRIFFITH, M.A. (1909.) Three vols. £3 : 3s. net.

Vol. I. ATLAS OF FACSIMILES IN COLLOTYPE.

Vol. II. LITHOGRAPHED HAND COPIES OF THE EARLIER DOCUMENTS.

Vol. III. KEY LIST, TRANSLATIONS, COMMENTARIES, AND INDEXES.

THE GREEK PAPYRI. By Professor ARTHUR S. HUNT, D.Lit.

Vol. I. LITERARY TEXTS. (1911.) 21s. net.

Vol. II. NON-LITERARY DOCUMENTS. (1915.) 21s. net.

Vol. III. NON-LITERARY DOCUMENTS. [In Preparation.]

PRINTED BOOKS AND MANUSCRIPTS. (1899.) 3 vols. 4to. 31s. 6d. net.

THE WESTERN MANUSCRIPTS. Part I. LATIN MANUSCRIPTS, Nos. 1-185. By M. R. JAMES, Litt.D. £3 : 3s. net.

Vol. I. DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE. With Index.

Vol. II. FACSIMILES IN COLLOTYPE.

THE JOHN RYLANDS FACSIMILES

A series of reproductions of unique and rare books in the possession of the Library.

No. I. PROPOSITIO JOHANNIS RUSSELL. Printed by WILLIAM CAXTON, circa A.D. 1476. 3s. 6d. net.

No. II. A BOOKE IN ENGLYSH METRE, of the Great Marchaunt man called " Dives Pragmaticus " . . . 1563. 5s. net.

No. III. A LITIL BOKE the whiche traytied and reherced many gode thinges necessities for the . . . Pestilence . . . made by the . . . Bisshop of Arusiens . . . (London) [1485 ?]. 5s. net.

No. IV. WOODCUTS OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY IN THE LIBRARY. Reproduced in Facsimile, with an Introduction and Notes by CAMPBELL DODGSON, M.A. In Portfolio. 7s. 6d. net.

18 MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY PRESS

THE JOHN RYLANDS LIBRARY—continued

EXHIBITION CATALOGUES

A series of Catalogues (mostly illustrated) of Special Exhibitions of books in the possession of the Library.

AN EXHIBITION ILLUSTRATING THE HISTORY OF THE TRANSMISSION OF THE BIBLE. 6d. net.

ORIGINAL EDITIONS OF THE PRINCIPAL ENGLISH CLASSICS. (1910.) 6d. net.

GREEK AND LATIN CLASSICS. See under "A Brief Historical Description," below, p. 19.

ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, principally Biblical and Liturgical. (1908.) 6d. net.

MÆDIEVAL MANUSCRIPTS AND BOOK COVERS. 6d. net.

ORIGINAL EDITIONS OF THE PRINCIPAL WORKS OF JOHN MILTON, arranged in celebration of the tercentenary of his birth. (1908.) 6d. net.

SHAKESPEARE, HIS SOURCES, AND THE WRITINGS OF HIS PRINCIPAL CONTEMPORARIES. (1916.) 1s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

A CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE OF THE WORKS ON ARCHITECTURE AND THE ALLIED ARTS IN THE PRINCIPAL LIBRARIES OF MANCHESTER AND SALFORD. Edited by H. GUPPY, M.A., and G. VINE, M.A. 3s. 6d. net, or interleaved 4s. 6d. net.

AN ACCOUNT OF A COPY FROM THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY of a map of the world preserved in Cardinal Stephen Borgia's Museum at Velletri. By A. E. NORDENSKIÖLD. 7s. 6d. net.

THE ODES AND PSALMS OF SOLOMON. Facsimile of the original manuscript, with a transliteration of the text, an introduction, etc., etc. By J. RENDEL HARRIS, M.A., Litt.D., and A. MINGANA, D.D. 2 vols.

Vol. I: THE TEXT, with facsimile reproductions. 10s. 6d. net.

Vol. II: TRANSLATION AND INTRODUCTION. 10s. 6d. net. [In the Press.]

THE ORIGIN OF THE DOCTRINE OF THE TRINITY. A Popular Exposition. By J. RENDEL HARRIS. 2s. 6d. net.

THE RETURN OF THE "MAYFLOWER." An Interlude. By J. RENDEL HARRIS. 2s. 6d. net.

THE JOHN RYLANDS LIBRARY—continued.

MISCELLANEOUS—continued

AN ANALYTICAL CATALOGUE OF THE CONTENTS OF THE TWO EDITIONS OF "AN ENGLISH GARNER," compiled by E. ARBER, and rearranged under the editorship of THOMAS SECCOMBE. 1s. net.

SUMERIAN TABLETS FROM UMMU IN THE LIBRARY. Transcribed, Transliterated, and Translated by C. L. BEDALE, M.A. Foreword by Canon C. H. W. JOHNS, M.A., Litt.D. With Ten Plates. 4to, 5s. net.

A BRIEF HISTORICAL DESCRIPTION OF THE LIBRARY AND ITS CONTENTS, with Catalogue of an exhibition of Greek and Latin Classics. (1906.) Plates. 1s. net.

A BRIEF HISTORICAL DESCRIPTION OF THE LIBRARY AND ITS CONTENTS. With Plates. 6d. net.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE DRAGON. Based upon Three Lectures delivered in the Library on "The Birth of Aphrodite," "Incense and Libations," and "Dragons and Rain Gods." By Professor G. Elliot Smith. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

BULLETIN OF THE LIBRARY. Issued quarterly, price 1s. net each part. Volumes already published :

- Vol. I. (1903-8.) Part 1 out of print. Parts 2 to 6, 1s. net each.
- Vol. II. (October 1914 to December 1915.) 4s. net.
- Vol. III. (January 1916 to April 1917.) 4s. net.
- Vol. IV. (May 1917 to June 1918.) 4s. net.
- Vol. V. Nos. 1 and 2 (August 1918 to March 1919). 2s. net.

REPRINTS FROM THE BULLETIN

A Series of Lectures and original articles, many of which are illustrated—

BRUTON (F. A., M.A.). THE STORY OF PETERLOO. Written for the Centenary, August 16, 1919. 1s. net.

CONWAY (Professor R. S., Litt.D., F.B.A.). THE VENETIAN POINT OF VIEW IN ROMAN HISTORY. 1s. net.

HARRIS (Dr. J. RENDEL). THE ASCENT OF OLYMPUS. Four Lectures. 5s. net.

Contents, which may be obtained separately :

THE ORIGIN OF THE CULT OF APOLLO.	[Out of Print.
THE ORIGIN OF THE CULT OF DIONYSOS.
THE ORIGIN OF THE CULT OF ARTEMIS. 1s. net.	[Out of Print.
THE ORIGIN OF THE CULT OF APHRODITE. 1s. net.

— THE ORIGIN AND MEANING OF APPLE CULTS. 1s. 6d. net.

HERFORD (Professor C. H., Litt.D.). NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL IDEALS IN THE ENGLISH POETS. 1s. net.

— THE POETRY OF LUCRETIVS. 1s. net.

— NORSE MYTH IN ENGLISH POETRY. 1s. net.

THE JOHN RYLANDS LIBRARY—continued

REPRINTS FROM THE BULLETIN—continued

MINGANA (A., D.D.). SOME EARLY JUDÆO-CHRISTIAN DOCUMENTS IN THE LIBRARY. 2s. net.

PEAKE (Professor A. S., D.D.). THE QUINTESSENCE OF PAULINISM. 1s. net.

— BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES FOR STUDENTS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. 6d. net.

PERRY (W. J., B.A.). WAR AND CIVILISATION. 1s. 6d. net.

POEL (W.). A CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE SHOWING WHAT IS PROVED AND WHAT IS NOT PROVED ABOUT SHAKSPERE'S LIFE AND WORK. 2s. net.

— SOME NOTES ON SHAKESPEARE'S STAGE AND PLAYS. 1s. net.

POWICKE (F. J., Ph.D.). A PURITAN IDYLL: RICHARD BAXTER (1615-1691) AND HIS LOVE STORY. 1s. net.

RIVERS (W. H. R., M.D., F.R.S.). DREAMS AND PRIMITIVE CULTURE. 1s. net.

— MIND AND MEDICINE. 1s. net.

ELLIOT SMITH (Professor G.). THE INFLUENCE OF ANCIENT EGYPTIAN CIVILISATION IN THE EAST AND AMERICA. 1s. net.

THUMB (Professor A., D.Phil.). THE MODERN GREEK AND HIS ANCESTRY. 1s. net.

TOUT (Professor T. F.). A MEDIÆVAL BURGLARY. 1s. net.

— THE ENGLISH CIVIL SERVICE IN THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY. 1s. net.

— MEDIÆVAL TOWN PLANNING. 1s. 6d. net.

— MEDIÆVAL AND MODERN WARFARE. 1s. net.

PUBLICATIONS OF LEARNED SOCIETIES

THE CHETHAM SOCIETY

Founded in 1843 for the publication of historical and literary remains connected with the palatine counties of Lancaster and Cheshire.

The annual subscription is £1. Applications for membership, which is open to Libraries, should be made to

The University Press, Manchester.

RECENT AND FORTHCOMING VOLUMES

Nos. LXXIV., LXXVI., LXXVIII. THE COUCHER BOOK OF FURNESS ABBEY, Vol. II. Edited by JOHN BROWNBILL, M.A. Part I. (1915), Part II. (1916), Part III. (1919).

No. LXXV. THE DOMESDAY SURVEY OF CHESHIRE. Edited by Professor JAMES TAIT. 1916.

No. LXXVII. LANCASHIRE QUARTER SESSIONS RECORDS. Vol. I. Edited by Professor JAMES TAIT. 1917.

No. LXXIX. THE CHARTULARY OF ST. WERBURGH'S ABBEY, CHESTER, Vol. I. [In the Press.]

THE MANCHESTER MUSEUM

(Complete list on application.)

THE MANCHESTER LITERARY AND PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

Sixty-two volumes have already been published, many of which may still be had at varying prices. They may be obtained in bound volumes or in single parts, three parts constituting a volume.

Vol. LXII. Part II. Issued separately in cloth. 10s. 6d. net.

THE FOSSIL FORAMINIFERA OF THE BLUE MARL, CÔTE DES BASQUES, BIARRITZ. By the late EDWARD HALKYARD. Edited and revised by E. HERON ALLEN and A. EARLAND. With 8 Plates and 1 Map.

22 MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY PRESS

PUBLICATIONS OF LEARNED SOCIETIES—continued

THE BRITISH SOCIETY OF FRANCISCAN STUDIES

VOLUMES ALREADY PUBLISHED OR IN THE PRESS

- VOL. I. LIBER EXEMPLORUM AD USUM PRAEDICANTIUM SAECULO XIII COMPOSITUS A QUODAM FRATRE MINORE AN-GLICO DE PROVINCIA HIBERNIAE, SECUNDUM CODICEM
DUNELMENSEM. Editus per A. G. LITTLE. 1908.
- VOL. II. FRATRIS JOHANNIS PECHAM, QUONDAM ARCHI-EPISCOPI CANTUARIENSIS, TRACTATUS TRES DE PAUPERTATE, CUM BIBLIOGRAPHIA. Ediderunt C. L. KINGSFORD, A. G. LITTLE,
F. Tocco. 1910.
- VOL. III. FRATRIS ROGERI BACON COMPENDIUM STUDII
THEOLOGIAE. Edidit H. RASHDALL, una cum Appendice de Operibus Rogeri Bacon, edita per A. G. LITTLE. 1911.
- VOL. IV. PART OF THE OPUS TERTIUM OF ROGER BACON, INCLUDING A FRAGMENT NOW PRINTED FOR THE FIRST TIME.
Edited by A. G. LITTLE. 1912.
- VOL. V. COLLECTANEA FRANCISCANA I. Ediderunt A. G.
LITTLE, M. R. JAMES, H. M. BANNISTER. 1914.
- VOL. VI. THE GREY FRIARS OF LONDON: THEIR HISTORY WITH THE REGISTER OF THEIR CONVENT AND AN APPENDIX OF DOCUMENTS. By CHARLES LETHBRIDGE KINGSFORD. 1915.
- VOL. VII. SOME NEW SOURCES FOR THE LIFE OF BLESSED AGNES OF BOHEMIA. By WALTER W. SETON. 1915.
- VOL. VIII. BLESSED GILES OF ASSISI. By WALTER W. SETON.
1918.
- EXTRA SERIES. VOL. I. FRANCISCAN ESSAYS. By PAUL SABATIER and others. (Father CUTHBERT, O.S.F.C., Father PASCHAL ROBIN-SON, O.S.F., EDMUND G. GARDNER, A. G. LITTLE, EVELYN UNDERHILL, E.
GURNEY SALTER.) 1912.

In preparation :

- MATERIALS FOR THE HISTORY OF THE FRANCISCAN PROVINCE OF IRELAND, A.D. 1230-1450. Collected and edited by the late Rev. Father E. B. FITZMAURICE, O.F.M., and A. G. LITTLE.
- COLLECTANEA FRANCISCANA II. By C. L. KINGSFORD and others.
- ROGER BACON'S MEDICAL WORKS. Edited by E. T.
WITHINGTON and A. G. LITTLE.

Terms of membership may be obtained on application to The University Press, Manchester.

